CONGRESSIONAL RECORD AND APPENDIX,

FORTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

concerned, for President of the United States. Those who had voted for Burr intended to make him Vice-President, while the votes for Jefferson were intended for him for President; and yet when they came to the count under that Constitution the result showed, as set forth, Jefferson 73, and Burr 73, without any distinction in the vote of the electoral college to enable the fact to appear which votes were intended for President or which for Vice-President; and thus came the first strain upon our institutions under that Constitution. From February 11 to 17 inclusive thirty-five ballots were taken, each resulting in giving eight States to Mr. Jefferson, six States to Mr. Burr, with the votes of two States divided. On the thirty-sixth ballot ten States voted for Jefferson, four for Burr, and two in blank.

Thus this strain upon the Constitution ended, but the bitterness and dangers of the contest prepared the country for an amendment of the Constitution. And, at this day and amid the criticisms of this time, it is perhaps permissible to look back to that struggle and consider some of the comments that have been made upon it. Judge Cooley, in the International Review for April, 1878, said:

On that occasion Mr. Burr, though probably not the choice of a single elector, might have been and probably would have been chosen but for the patriotism of Mr. Hamilton and a few others among the Federalists who protested against it. But Mr. Jefferson's election was not accomplished until after the subject of filling the position in some extraconstitutional mode had been mooted, the attempt to do which would probably have been resisted by force.

While the late Senator Oliver P. Morton, in the North American Review, July-August, 1877, makes the following statement:

In 1801 the House of Representatives balloted for a number of days without making choice of a President. The 4th of March was approaching, and there was danger of its coming without a President being elected—danger of an interregnum. On the night of the day before the election a member of the House, who represented a State that had but one member, went to a friend of Mr. Jefferson, and said to him: "If Mr. Jefferson will give assurance that he will retain the collector of the port of Wilmington, in Delaware, and at Philadelphia, and will give two bills (which were named) his approvel, I will change my vote to-morrow, and know of two other members from two different States who will change their votes. The effect of it will be to change the votes of those States, and give to Mr. Jefferson three additional votes, which will elect him." The message was carried to Mr. Jefferson, so said his friends, and on the next morning the assurance was given that the two collectors should be retained and the laws approved. The three members that day did change their votes, and Mr. Jefferson was elected.

This is a part of the history of the times, and I give you my authority. It indicates distinctly and forcibly the dangers that may come upon any body-politic by the existence of a controversy for which there is no fixed rule of settlement, and which may be determined by party spirit or political needs or the expectation of benefits to be secured by continuing one party in power or by the giving of supremacy to another.

Mr. JORDAN. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PARKER. Certainly.

Mr. JORDAN. Have you authority for the statement that Thomas Jefferson agreed to any proposition of that kind, except the statement of Senator Morton?

Mr. PARKER. I make no assertion on any other authority than that which I have given. I have given that of the great Senator, the war governor of Indiana, a man with whom few cared to contend in his lifetime here or elsewhere, and who as far as I know no man has criticised since his death. I repeat to you merely what he has written.

Mr. HUNT. Will you be kind enough to name the member from Delaware to whom reference was made?

Mr. PARKER. I have no knowledge on that point. I refer you to Mr. Morton's statement and to the history that must have existed back of it.

FIFTH ELECTORAL COUNT.

February, 1805, the first count was had under the new Constitution. The electors chosen at the election of 1804 were the first who voted for a Vice-President as such. The two Houses met, and the President of the Senate, Aaron Burr, broke the seals of the returns, the senatorial teller read aloud the returns, the House tellers compared them, and the President of the Senate declared the result. Objections were made by petition on the part of citizens of Massachusetts to the counting the votes of that State, upon the ground that the Legislature had not sought the approval of the governor of the State, as required. Mr. Randolph stated that the electors were as much the judges of their own qualifications as members of the House of Representatives were of theirs, and said:

It appears to me as competent to the people of any part of this country to prefer a petition to the electoral college to set aside the returns of any members of Congress as to prefer petitions to this House to set aside the qualifications of electors.

After much comment it seemed to be the better opinion that interference with the title of electors by Congress would form a dangerous precedent and the petitions were disregarded.

SIXTH ELECTORAL COUNT.

February, 1809, the two Houses as such met with tellers, and the returns were opened and the votes counted and declared as before, with no new questions arising.

SEVENTH ELECTORAL COUNT.

February, 1813, the two Houses as such assembled, and the returns were opened and the votes counted and declared as before, no especial features appearing.

EIGHTH ELECTORAL COUNT.

February, 1817, the two Houses as such met as before. The three electors of the new State of Indiana had been chosen before she was declared admitted into the Union by Congress. A member of the House of Representatives from New York sought to object to these votes and to state his reasons therefor. The Speaker interrupted him, and the Senate upon the vote of its own body retired to its own Chamber. The question was discussed at some length, and the House again met, and the votes of the new State were counted.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Was the question directly raised?

Mr. PARKER. The question was argued incidentally but not directly. It was argued by members of the two Houses as such in their separate meetings. But there was no argument in the convention.

Mr. EATON. It was not fully argued.

Mr. PARKER. As the chairman of the committee suggests, it was not fully argued, but was left, as many of these other controversies were, in abeyance, a final explicit decision being passed over and avoided as upon a question which it was dangerous to be too definite about.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Objection was made while the two Houses were sitting together?

Mr. PARKER. Objection was made, and the question came up, and without being directly decided, the vote was counted.

It is easy to see that had the question of the success of one party or the other depended upon the counting or rejection of these 3 votes a political convulsion might have followed, but James Monroe had 180 electoral votes out of the 210, not counting Indiana, and disturbance was readily avoided.

NINTH ELECTORAL COUNT.

February, 1821, the two Houses as such met as before. A controversy occurred as to the counting of the 3 votes of the new State of Missouri. After much debate and amid considerable clamor the votes were counted. James Monroe had 231 of the 232 electoral votes cast for President.

As a result of these contests we are told that in the Eighteenth Congress, as well as several others, resolutions proposing to amend the Constitution were introduced. Thomas H. Benton is reported to have said in connection with one of them:

Two questions of great delicacy now present themselves.
1. If electors are not appointed according to the Constitution, can their votes be counted?
2. If objected to, who shall judge them?
It is the duty of the two Houses of Congress to count the votes. Can they count unconstitutional votes?
If they can not, shall they not judge every vote before it is counted?

TENTH ELECTORAL COUNT.

At the election of 1824 no choice of President was made by the electors. Andrew Jackson had 99 votes, John Q. Adams 84, William H. Crawford 41, and Henry Clay 37; whole number of electors, 261; no one having a majority, the choice devolved upon the House of Representatives, voting as States, each State having one vote.

This election was, like many campaigns since that date, a struggle of party chiefs for supremacy and power. The vote, taken in February, 1825, stood: For Adams, 13 votes; for Jackson, 7 votes; for Crawford, 4 votes. Jackson had a large proportional popular vote and more electors than any other, but failed of an election. Mr. Clay threw his vote and influence for Mr. Adams, who was thereby elected, and Mr. Clay became his Secretary of State. The charge of "corruption" was fiercely made, and the cry of "the coalition" followed both as long as they lived.

Mr. EATON. You ought to state there whether they were all members of the same party.

Mr. PARKER. The chairman of the committee suggests they were members of the same party.

Mr. EATON. I asked you if they were not.

Mr. PARKER. I think not.

Mr. EATON. It might interfere with your argument.

Mr. PARKER. I presume my opinion upon that point as I have read the history of that time would not agree with that of the gentleman from Connecticut.

ELEVENTH AND TWELFTH ELECTORAL COUNTS.

In each of these counts the two Houses met as before and the packages were opened, lists made, the votes stated, and the result announced according to the precedents given.

THIRTEENTH ELECTORAL COUNT.

In this count the preliminary proceedings were according to the precedents, but questions were presented and debated by the respective Houses as to the admission of votes cast by electors holding appointments under the Federal Government, and the State of Michigan had chosen her electors before her admission into the Union. All of the votes were counted, as the result was not affected, but an effort was made to prevent these cases from being regarded as fixed precedents.

All of these cases show—

First. That the two Houses met and acted as separate and independent Houses, and never acted for a moment as a "joint convention."

Second. That the Houses avoided with especial and particular care all interference with encroachment upon the rights of States in appointing their electors.

The fourteenth count was without especial features, and was conducted as were others described.

THE FIFTEENTH COUNT.

This count occurred in February, 1845. At the previous election the thirty-six electors of the State of New York were turned from Henry Clay to James K. Polk by the drawing off of the anti-slavery Birney vote of between five and six thousand. New York's electoral vote thrown for Clay would have elected him President, and would doubtless have changed the fortunes of men and the history of the country.

The fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth counts proceeded in the usual manner, the two Houses as such meeting and acting, nothing of especial note transpiring.

THE EIGHTEENTH COUNT.

The day for the voting by the electors fell on December 3; by reason of a severe storm the electors of the State of Wisconsin were prevented from voting until the 4th; objection was made to the counting of the votes on that ground, and a long debate occurred in each House in relation thereto, but the votes were allowed to stand as announced, although the result was nowise affected. A great deal of criticism and contention arose over the question of the rights of a State and of the two Houses and the establishment of a dangerous precedent.

The nineteenth count was without particular incident.

TWENTIETH COUNT.

This count arose upon the election of 1864. And the question was forced upon the two Houses as to what consideration should be given to the electoral votes of States in rebellion, or not yet returned to full relations with States of the Union, and the question might involve not only States in actual armed rebellion, but also such as were partially reconstructed.

The counting of the votes occurred February 8, 1865. On February 4, after a long debate, Congress passed a joint resolution excluding from the electoral count all votes from eleven States the inhabitants and local authorities of which were in rebellion, which resolution was sent to the President. Then, on February 6, Senator Trumbull reported the twenty-second joint rule, which was immediately adopted by both Houses.

While the excluding resolution was in the hands of the President the day for the count came, and the count proceeded under the new joint rule. On the day of the count President Lincoln signed the resolution, which was returned to the Senate February 10, with a message disclaiming confidence in it or responsibility for it.

The spirit and effect of this rule is in the following words:

If upon the reading of any [such] certificate by the tellers any question shall arise in regard to counting the votes therein certified, the same having been stated by the presiding officer, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and the question shall thereupon be submitted to that body for its decision. And the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall in like manner submit said question to the House of Representatives for its decision. And no question shall be decided affirmatively, and no vote objected to shall be counted, except by the concurrent votes of the two Houses.

Under this twenty-second joint rule the twentieth, twenty-first, and twenty-second electoral counts took place, the rule being in effect that in case of controversy the State should be excluded unless the two Houses concurred in receiving the vote. On the twentieth count only the votes of twenty-five States were counted. On the twenty-first count Georgia was counted hypothetically and a long debate upon the rights of Houses and of States accompanied the proceedings. On the twenty-second count three votes of the State of Georgia were not counted by reason of their having been cast for Horace Greeley after his death.

The votes offered from Arkansas were excluded upon the ground that they were not properly certified, the House voting to receive them and the Senate voting that they should not be counted. Louisiana presented double antagonistic returns, and her votes were excluded by the concurrence of the two Houses.

This brief review brings the history of the counts down to the momentous controversy of 1876–'77—the Hayes-Tilden contest, the Electoral Commission result, and the famous struggle, the points of which are distinctly in the remembrance of all.

There may well be grave doubts whether the painful recollections of the horrors of the war of the rebellion did not do much to prevent an appeal to force in 1877. And one party was as grateful as the other that the majority in 1880 was sufficiently large to preclude the possibility of dispute upon it.

During the whole lifetime of the Republic under the Constitution efforts have been made, from time to time, to amend the Constitution and to enact legislation which should secure a plain, just, and safe method of canvassing and counting the electoral votes. But we are now approaching the twenty-fifth electoral count conscious of the perils we may encounter but with no preparation to escape them.

Alexander Hamilton in the Federalist quotes approvingly and italicises the following from the essays of Hume:

To balance a large state or society, whether monarchical or republican, on general laws, is a work of so great difficulty, that no human genius, however comprehensive, is able by the mere dint of reason and reflection to effect it. The judgments of many must unite in the work; experience must guide their labor; time must bring it to perfection, and the feeling of inconveniences must correct the mistakes which they inevitably fall into in their first trials and experiments.

It was the theory of the makers of the Constitution that the electors should be chosen from the best and most trusted men of the State, and that they should confer and deliberate, and themselves select and designate the man, not of the people's choice, but of their own choice.

The theory was that the people could not be intrusted with so delicate and important a privilege as the selection of a ruler. It was a theory inherited from the governments of Europe.

The scheme of the first constitution was that the elector should vote according to his private judgment and by a secret ballot for "two persons," and that the man receiving the most of these votes should be President and the next highest on the list should be Vice-President, and the public were to accept the selection without directing it.

The twelfth amendment, after the contest between Jefferson and Burr, after the election of 1800, only changed the scheme, by providing for the voting for President and Vice-President, instead of voting for "two persons," but the theory of the independence of the electors to select the President and Vice-President without regard to the opinions or preferences of the people remained undisturbed. It was as little expected that the public would influence the selection as it would be that popular notions should control the decision of a court of equity. But all of this rapidly changed. The development of politics and of politicians; the collisions of the ambitions of men; the growth of the people in numbers, substance, and intelligence; the alignment of great bodies of men upon questions affecting the feelings and the interests of the masses soon developed the voters of the nation into the dictators of electors and the direct creators of Presidents and administrations until, with no written change in the fundamental instrument, it has been for more than half a century the universal judgment that an elector who should disregard his party's will in casting his electoral vote would be regarded as unapproachably infamous.

Thus has grown up a change of method tremendous in its effects. The President, instead of being selected by the almost judicial judgment of a few selected men, is the chosen popular chieftain of the party to which he belongs, obligated so far as he lawfully may to represent its principles and policy and to develop its power. It is in the contest between great parties arrayed against each other, contending for political supremacy in the nation, that the danger to our institutions exists; and the very focal point of danger is at the electoral count.

As the governments of the world are organized the Presidency of the United States is the greatest political prize for which men or parties may contest. Hamilton says "a nation without a national government is an awful spectacle." A nation divided into two great parties, each honestly believing itself entitled to govern under the Constitution and the laws, with no tribunal having the conceded and recognized right to decide the questions at issue, may present a spectacle more awful still.

Mr. Speaker, I shall now ask some attention directly to the bills under consideration. It will be admitted on all hands, I believe, that it is our duty to pass some law which shall remedy the troubles we have been threatened with, and that the matter can only be settled by the passage of a law or an amendment of the Constitution. Rules and joint rules have been exhausted. There is not time to amend the Constitution with a Presidential election approaching, and we are therefore called upon to pass the best law we can under the circumstances by which we are surrounded. This law should be such as experience dictates and the public judgment expects of us. The public demands a fair law, one that shall be a just and fixed rule of action for such necessary procedure as the Constitution has not elaborated.

This, then, is our problem: to enact a law fair and wise, consistent with the Constitution, regulating the determination of such preliminary incidental and collateral questions as shall arise upon the return of the votes and the count. The vote to be counted is the vote of the State. The vital question is, what or which is the vote of the State? This settled, Congress has no power or right except to accomplish the count.

I now call attention to these two bills which are before us; and I take it our action will naturally and probably be limited to one of these two bills. The Senate bill provides for the meeting of the electors substantially in accordance with the existing law. It also provides that each State, pursuant to its laws existing on the day fixed for the meeting of the electors, may determine at least six days before the meeting of the electoral college any controversy respecting the appointment of any of them. And here I will notice that the chairman of the House committee seems to criticise the provisions of the Senate bill and to argue that those provisions if carried out will bring us into trouble instead of giving us peace and quiet. I do not assent to his views.

The first section of the Senate bill provides for the meeting of the electors.

The second section provides—

SEC. 2. That each State may, pursuant to its laws existing on the day fixed for the appointment of the electors, try and determine, at least six days before the time fixed for the meeting of the electors, any controversy concerning their appointment or the appointment of any of them. Every such determination made pursuant to such law so existing on said day, and made at least six days prior to the said time of meeting of the electors, shall be conclusive evidence of the lawful title to office of the electors who shall have been so determined to have been appointed, and shall govern in the counting of the electoral votes, as provided in the Constitution and as hereinafter regulated.

This is the provision that the State itself, six days before the time of the casting of the electoral vote, may, within its own borders and by its own powers, decide what the vote of the State is and what is the vote which shall be presented to the President of the Senate to be counted as the vote and the voice of the State. Among the general provisions for the counting of the votes is a provision for the meeting of the two Houses as such, each House retaining its organized form from beginning to end, each being an independent body.

The first great point of difference between the bills is, that the Senate bill provides for this final decision of the States, and the second is that the Senate bill holds to the old practice of the two Houses adhering to their character as organized bodies. The Eaton bill, if I may so call it, provides that the members of the two Houses shall meet in "joint convention," all Senators and members to "have equal power, influence, and voice, and all to vote per capita on all questions arising." This bill also allows any three members of the joint convention to bring in question any of the State electors. The Senate bill also provides that in cases of rival returns or of votes objected to by at least one Senator and one member of the House, when no final decision has been made by the State tribunals, then in such cases only those votes shall be counted which the two Houses acting separately shall concurrently approve.

The Senate bill was this year introduced by a distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, and is to some extent the work of a distinguished Senator from Vermont. It is doubtless the resulting product of many minds, acting in one manner and another for a long period of years upon the questions of the electoral count.

I have a few words to say as to the constitutionality of this Eaton bill. In commenting upon the Senate bill the gentleman from Connecticut characterized it as unconstitutional. Now let us look for a moment at the bill that he presents as a substitute.

The Constitution provides that the "President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the vote shall then be counted." The Eaton bill provides that the certificates shall be opened in a body composed of the members of the Senate and House of Representatives as a joint convention. The certificates are not opened in the presence of the Senate or of the House as such, either or both, but before the joint convention. That body hears the reading of the certificates and the papers as a joint convention, and it hears the announcement of the state of the vote as a joint convention.

The objectors object not as Senators or Representatives but as members of the joint convention, and the members of that joint convention vote per capita to determine questions that may arise. Therefore this scheme, instead of pursuing the course authorized by the Constitution for the opening and counting of the votes before the Senate and House of Representatives, nullifies the language and the spirit of the Constitution entirely, and provides for an unconstitutional body.

I now go a step further, and call attention to some of the practical objections which exist to the bill offered as a substitute. First, as to the joint convention. In addition to what has been said by the gentleman who preceded me [Mr. HART]—and I presume that I shall repeat somewhat of his argument—this tribunal is unknown to our Constitution and has been to this day unknown to our laws. I am aware that there crops out occasionally a word or a sentence in reference to such a body in the discussions had upon this interesting question of the electoral count which have taken place heretofore and equal volumes in amount. There have been suggestions on the part of some men of the possibility of a joint convention or a mass convention or a grand board or a grand committee or something of that kind; but to our Constitution and laws the thing is new.

This substitute seeks to create a new consolidated body with judicial powers, and comprised of the members of both Houses, members with equal undivided legal capacity, acting not as Senators or as Representatives or as legislators even, but as members of a kind of general court; in short, I might characterize it, without wishing to throw odium upon it, as an electoral commission of four hundred and one members. No oath is prescribed to be taken by the members of this joint convention. It may be claimed that its members are already acting under oath. So they are when they are acting as members of the two Houses to which they were respectively elected. So also were the members of the body known as the Electoral Commission. They were all, when acting in their separate capacities, acting under the oath of their respective offices. But in that Electoral Commission they were required to take a new oath prescribed. Under the theory of the Senate bill no new oath is required, but the Houses act as such and such only.

Under this Eaton bill the use of the phrase "President of the Senate" is merely a fictitious use, to comply with the letter of the Constitution, and to show that the act of the presiding officer of the joint convention is not in any wise regarded as the act of the President of the Senate. By this bill the presiding officer at one moment is the President of the Senate, and I suppose as such he opens the certificates. The next moment he is the presiding officer of the joint convention. At the one moment he acts as the President of the Senate in a body in which there is no Senate, and then he lapses again into the presiding officer of a convention of four hundred and one members.

Again, I think it is not well that objections to any of the votes should be made by members of the joint convention as such; for all of the objectors to any vote may be members of one House only. It would seem more fit that the objectors should act in their distinct and respective capacities as members of the Houses to which they belong, and under the oath which they have solemnly taken when they became members of those Houses respectively.

The Senate bill provides for an objection to a vote as well as an objection to a return. The Eaton bill provides for an objection to a return only, as I understand its intent.

The joint convention is not a meeting of the two Houses as such, and the objectors object not as Senators or Representatives, but only as members of that joint convention. The voting per capita contradicts two manifest ideas of the Constitution, one of which provides that the counting shall be in the presence of the two Houses, and the other that in case of failure to elect, the President shall be chosen by the House of Representatives, voting by States. The voting per capita is against the logic and the analogy of these two provisions. They vote neither as members of the House nor by States, but as members of a joint convention per capita, and the majority of this convention decides the result; and this body, not authorized nor recognized by the Constitution or by precedent, is to have the power to object to the votes of States and to annul them, and to decide valid or invalid the returns of the States, and to change at will the great current of the administrational and political life of fifty-five millions of people.

By the theory of the Constitution the House of Representatives represents the people; the Senate represents the States. The theory of this bill upsets these distinctions, mingles the members of the bodies as individuals, confuses them as to representative position, and destroys the influence of the Houses upon each other and the wise balancing of power between them.

Now, a word as to the State rights involved in this question. I would not presume ordinarily to comment upon the State-rights doctrines of the gentleman from Connecticut. I believe they are well known, and he has not been indistinct in expressing them. But it seems to me that the exigencies of this bill, the pressure of the past, and perhaps the demands of the future have carried him from his standing along with the strong current in which he finds himself, and that he is not in connection with the provisions of this bill the State-rights statesman that I have heretofore understood him to be.

The right of each State to appoint its electors is unquestioned. It is unchangeably fixed in the Constitution. Article II, section 1, provides that "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress."

Now, the State is more than its voters; it is more than its Legislature, more than its judiciary, more than its executive officers. It includes them all. Now, I ask for a moment a consideration of the criticism made by the gentleman from Connecticut upon the Senate bill. He says that the second section of the Senate bill provides, as he understands it, that if there is a judicial decision in the State from which the appointment comes, that decision, although it may be tainted by fraud, and the outgrowth of corruption, yet being a judicial decision must under that bill be absolutely final; that there can be no escape from it, although it may be rotten with fraud.

Now, I do not understand that section to so provide. It provides for the exhausting of all the machinery and power of the State, if necessary, to prevent fraud and to ascertain the actual vote of the State, not only by judicial decision, but, if need be, by the action not only of the judiciary, but of the Legislature, of the executive officers—the governor, comptroller, and other officers constituting the State board. It comprehends the whole. Under this bill the State has the power to so guard and hedge about the selection, appointment, and final designation of these electors that the result will be the nearest just and right that we can ever hope to obtain, considering that the affairs of the Government are dependent upon the acts of men. The State does not exhaust its appointive power until it has used all these powers. The claim that the proceeding contemplated by this bill is interference by Congress with the right of the State is one of the allegations of the gentleman from Connecticut. But the charge is unfounded. The action of Congress under this section is the securing of the right of the State to perform its own work in its own way under the Constitution. It follows in effect the precedents which have been set in the counting of the electoral votes for nearly a hundred years—that the count should be made before the Houses, but that the rights of the States shall be respected, and the State's right to appoint fully recognized.

The gentleman's argument that this measure is an interference with State rights places him entirely upon the wrong side in the construction of this bill. The bill is an expression of the respect that the nation holds for the rights of the States.

While I am in favor of liberal construction as to national powers, and in favor of making stronger instead of weaker the National Government, while I regard with abhorrence the theory of those who seek to disintegrate the nation and aggrandize the States, yet I consider it my duty to oppose by every means in my power this scheme which grasps the electoral rights of every State, however solemnly determined by the State, and subjects them upon the act of three members of a House to a majority vote that may, in spite of every care and safeguard, declare void the action of the electors and disfranchise the State.

Now, a few words as to the position taken in this debate by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PRYOR]. That gentleman insists that upon the opening of the certificates the Houses disappear and are merged into a "primary body," a "board of inspectors and determinants," of which he says:

I repeat and now insist that in this word vote is included the ascertainment and determination of all defects, irregularities, illegalities, non-qualifications of electors or persons voted for, frauds, corruptions, or coercions, from the suffragan through its transit to this Federal board of inspectors, revisers, and determinants of last resort at the seat of the Government of the United States. This Federal board assembled and organized for the purpose, and charged with the duties thus imposed by my interpretation of the Constitution, proceed to discharge the same.

To do this, among other things, the twelfth amendment provides, as I contend, a high and select board of inspectors, revisers, and determinants, and charges them with the duty of ascertaining and counting the votes cast by the people of the several States, through the instrumentalities of the Constitution.

* * * * * * *

The claim of the elector must be not only based upon but the legitimate product of a legitimate vote, to determine which is the business of this Federal board.

* * * * * * *

This Federal board of determinants of last resort have a right to explore the whole voting area from center to circumference and from top to bottom.

* * * * * * *

This board, having the inherent right of self-organization, secures to itself the right to select and appoint its own officers and establish its own rules of procedure; and such being true, we are relieved of one of the disputed questions in the past, namely, that the President of the Senate, by right and force of his legislative office, and as such officer, has the right to be the presiding officer of this board or select body of men as inspectors and determinants of the Presidential count.

The Constitution says:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

By what authority do the Senate and House lose their constitutionally specified characters? When do the two bodies cease as such? At what point do they become a board? Where does the Constitution pulverize the two Houses into units, and then consolidate the units into "a board," "a special board," this "Federal board," this "high select board?"

What right have we to say that the framers of the Constitution, when they said "the Senate and House of Representatives," intended a "special board," discarding the President of the Senate, selecting its own officers, and establishing its own rules?

This Eaton bill as it comes before us assumes and adopts this doctrine; proceeds to enact into law this Federal board of inspectors that may investigate from center to circumference, from top to bottom; that can go back to the individual voter casting a vote in the State of Maine, Louisiana, or Oregon; can test the validity of that vote as originally cast; can extend such examination through every election district in the whole United States, and act all the time as the joint convention that is to be created here out of the membership of the two Houses to canvass, to count, to investigate, and to explore. I feel at liberty to commend to those who are in favor of this bill the prospect which is placed before them of the labors, the enjoyments, and the successes which they may obtain under its far-reaching powers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, no one for a moment supposes that a great party legislating for the whole country and for the future upon a subject of vast and vital importance would seek or would willingly receive a partisan benefit as a result of such legislation.

Therefore I can with propriety illustrate a possible effect of the proposed law by applying it to the present political situation in Congress.

AN ILLUSTRATION.

Not as a necessary part of the argument on this question, and without any intent to seek or oppose any partisan influence, I present the following figures as illustrative, and perhaps as suggestive, as to where "the dead-point" of the motion of the political balance-wheel may sometime be found: Present number of States, 38; number of Representatives, 325; number of Senators, 76; whole number of electors, 401. Present House of Representatives voting by States, Democratic, 22; present House of Representatives voting by States, Republican, 14; Readjuster (Virginia), 1; divided (Florida), 1; total, 38.

THE TWO HOUSES IN JOINT CONVENTION.

Democratic Senators, 36; Representatives, 196; total, 232. Republican Senators, 38; Representatives, 116; total, 154. All other Senators, 2; Representatives, 13; total, 15. Total Senators, 76; total Representatives, 325; grand total, 401. Present Democratic majority on a party vote in a joint convention, and dividing the scattering as "8 to 7," 77. Unascertained preferences of scattering voters and the results of the still existing travail of the Committee on Elections may somewhat change the figures, but the fact will remain that in determining the preliminary and collateral and other questions of the counting of the electoral votes of 1884 the Democrats would have a majority of about 77 votes, and in case no person receives a majority of "the whole number of electors appointed," the House choosing from the three highest candidates and voting by States as provided by the Constitution, the Democrats will have a party majority of probably 7 (votes) States.

Under the plan of the Constitution the two Houses take part in the proceedings of the electoral count. The almost uniform precedents of nearly one hundred years imply the presence, action, and co-operation of both Houses as such. Even in the Electoral Commission both Houses were equally represented. And it seems rash, revolutionary, and dangerous to seek now to place the whole power of the determination of the counting, the canvass, and the national result in the power of one House of Congress, the House of Representatives.

Under this proposed Eaton bill how readily might the members of this House create the occasion for an election of the President by this House of Representatives. First, three members may object to the counting of the votes of any State, or of any number of States; second, the question of their admission or rejection is decided by a per capita vote, the House furnishing a Democratic majority of at least 77; third, as a result, the power of choosing a Democratic President either by the "joint convention" or by the House is thus made perfect and absolute.

Suppose the 36 votes of the State of New York to be challenged by three Representatives elected in distant States upon local issues in 1882. Under this Eaton bill the House alone could disfranchise the State or admit contesting votes, although the judgment of the Senate should be unanimously against such action.

The very existence of this bill is a threat against the national peace. Sir, suppose a political party existed that was enraged by its belief that it had been some time wronged by its antagonist. Suppose its war-cry for a campaign to be for vindication and retribution. Suppose its very candidate to be the representative of the spirit of revenge grown morbid with the brooding of years. Suppose the mighty movements of this political army of millions to be stimulated by a desire for victory and retaliation. After a closely drawn battle, without overwhelming defeat, how readily, with the heat of such a struggle still inspiring it, could it turn from the "trial by suffrage" to success under the devices of legislation.

I am not here to criticise the Democratic party as such or to speak of it in any sense different from what might be spoken of the Republican party if it occupied a similar position. I refer only to the political demand made upon party men and the dangers to which politicians and parties and the country may be immediately and permanently exposed under the provisions of this Eaton bill.

In conclusion, I have but few words to add:

For more than eighty years efforts have been made from time to time, by propositions to amend the Constitution and by proposed enactments, to secure the country against the acknowledged dangers which have surrounded the proceedings of the electoral count.

I am fully convinced that the Senate bill now before us is the wisest and most perfect measure at present attainable.

With the completion of the approaching Presidential term we shall round out a full period of one hundred years of Presidential constitutional Government. We approach the last electoral count of the first century of our constitutional existence; we are a reunited people, strong, prosperous, and at peace.

But we are even now anxiously looking over the field of a pending political conflict which may arouse much of the fierceness of human nature and excite much of the bitterness of political strife. We are responsible to the American people and to the Ruler of all peoples for the exertion of every power possessed by us to guard our country and mankind against the catastrophe which might follow a disagreement in the count, a disputed succession, and factional strife.

In my judgment it is the duty of this House to concur with the Senate in the method of procedure it has proposed. It is wise and just, the result of the consideration of years. It can be immediately crystallized into law, and thus before the supreme hour of decision arrives we shall exclude all elements of danger.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, it is a source of regret that a bill of such importance as the one now before us should be considered at a time when so few members are present in their seats. There is no measure, sir, pending in Congress at the present session that involves questions of such vital importance to the welfare and peace of this country as the bill to provide the manner of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President. The committee in this House appointed for the purpose of considering matters of this kind has carefully prepared a bill, which is now before us, in the nature of a substitute for a similar bill which passed the Senate. The question for this House to consider now is whether you will take the bill recommended by the House Committee as a substitute for the Senate bill or adopt the Senate bill itself.

If this House should determine not to adopt the system proposed by the House committee for a joint convention, I should hope that there would be some amendment made to the Senate bill before that bill should be passed by this House. I refer particularly to the necessity for amendments to the second section of the bill, and to this section I ask the careful attention of the members present for a few moments. I think if you will understand this second section properly there will be few members of this House who would desire its enactment into a law. It provides—and I will read the text of the section, because it has been so carefully worded that its meaning could not be correctly given unless you heard the very language of the proposed statute itself—it provides as follows:

SEC. 2. That each State may, pursuant to its laws existing on the day fixed for the appointment of the electors, try and determine, at least six days before the time fixed for the meeting of the electors, any controversy concerning their appointment or the appointment of any of them. Every such determination made pursuant to such law so existing on said day, and made at least six days prior to the said time of meeting of the electors, shall be conclusive evidence of the lawful title to office of the electors who shall have been so determined to have been appointed, and shall govern in the counting of the electoral votes as provided in the Constitution and as hereinafter regulated.

Now, what is the purport of this section?

Each State may * * * try and determine.

Here would arise, as suggested by the argument of the gentleman from New York, the great unsettled problem of what constitutes a State. It means that each State may try and determine in the manner which its laws then existing have pointed out. Therefore that tribunal or that proceeding which the statute of the State had theretofore fixed for the determination of the question is to settle it. Hence a State may be dwarfed into the insignificant proportions of a returning board, or if you want to go further and get your tribunal still lower, you may come down to the functions of a judge of a district or a circuit or county court or even of a justice of the peace, as a mode of settling the disputed question.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let me ask the gentleman a question, and it is this: Do you suppose there is anything further meant by that provision than this: That in the first place the election of the electors is to be certified to by the regular canvassing board; second, if there is a question as to who is elected, that that question may be tried in the tribunals of the State as any other questions relating to the election of officers in the State are tried? Tribunals are established in the States for trying such cases, and the only effect of this is that their decision is binding upon Congress.

Mr. SPRINGER. It means precisely this: The State may by statute enacted before the day of election fix any tribunal that within its judgment it may be deemed necessary to decide any controversy concerning the appointment of the electors, or any one of them; and when that tribunal, whatever it may be, shall have settled that question within a certain period before the meeting of the electors, that result is final and conclusive upon Congress, and the electors decided by that tribunal to be legally appointed must be counted by the House and the Senate. That is what it means. It means that just such a returning board as there was in Louisiana in 1876, which was the means provided under the laws of Louisiana to determine who were legal electors, shall be final and conclusive upon Congress. It means just such a body as that provided by the laws of Florida in 1876, known as the Florida returning roard, whose acts in this respect shall be final and conclusive upon Congress.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Does not the State authority itself determine by law as to what are legal proceedings in reference to ascertaining the results of an election, and is not that final?

Mr. SPRINGER. There are of course such tribunals in the States. But at that time there was a proceeding in the courts of that State which set aside the determination of a returning board. But that was aliunde and went for nothing, especially when it came to seating the man who was elected.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. If this bill had been in force at that time would not that decision have been conclusive upon Congress, and would we not have been compelled to count the vote of Florida for Tilden?

Mr. SPRINGER. It would depend upon the fact as to whether the State had provided that manner of determining this fact. The judges in the Florida case acted under the general jurisdiction of that State over the officers of the State, and there was no special authority to pass upon the election and qualification of electors of President and Vice-President. But in this bill it is presumed that the State would act upon this very question and point out a manner in which that question should be determined. And it is provided here that when that controversy has been settled by that tribunal there is no power in the Constitution or in Congress to challenge that judgment or decision.

Gentlemen have said something about State rights. It seems to me that that is carrying State rights further than has ever been suggested by at least any political party in this country heretofore. It is carrying it to the extent of saying that the judgment of a circuit court, or of the judge of a circuit court or of a district court if he were the tribunal provided, or of a returning board consisting of three or five, as the case may be, no matter how corruptly they may have acted or how illegal or unwarrantable their decision may have been or how outrageous it may have been, so far as the voice of the people of that State is concerned. Yet we must stand still and receive it, because it was decided in the manner pointed out by that tribunal. I do not understand that any State in this Union in voting for a President or Vice-President can insist upon that vote being counted by Congress against the voice of the people of the State and against the popular judgment of the country. But I understand that the Constitution has given the power to count these votes to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I would like to know where?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will tell you right now. The amendment to the Constitution provides that the electoral votes shall be forwarded to the President of the Senate, and—

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

Shall then be counted. There; right then and there. This bill says they shall be counted by a returning board that may have met six days before the electors met in the State, and that that count is final. But the Constitution says that "the votes shall then be counted."

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. By whom?

Mr. SPRINGER. That is what I am coming to. There is no place in the Constitution where the manner in which this count shall be made is pointed out. But there is a provision in the Constitution, which I have read, that the vote shall then be counted. Now, this is no implied power. We are not to look around in the dark places of the Constitution to find a power to count these votes. It says expressly "the votes shall then be counted."

Now let us look at the other provisions of the Constitution. I concede the fact that the manner in which this count shall take place is not mentioned in the Constitution. Nowhere is it provided. And hence the Electoral Commission was appointed for the purpose of counting these votes in 1877.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If the gentleman will indulge me a moment——

Mr. SPRINGER. I am just now making a statement which I desire to complete; and I will yield to the gentleman in a moment. I remember distinctly, Mr. Speaker, when the Electoral Commission bill was before this House one of the most distinguished lawyers then upon the floor, now a Senator from the State of Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR], standing where my friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] is now standing, made his argument in favor of the constitutionality of the bill reported by the joint committee, at that time known as the Electoral Commission bill—and that argument applies to the bill reported by this committee as well—because the Constitution left the question of providing the manner in which the votes should be counted to Congress. There is a clause in the Constitution which gives the Congress that power. I refer to the eighteenth clause of section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution.

Congress shall have the power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or office thereof.

Now, when the fathers made the Constitution they assumed that many questions would arise hereafter under it which they had not covered, and perhaps they did not intend, and I assume they did not intend, to cover all of them. It was a declaration of general principles. The manner in which the votes for President and Vice-President shall be counted is one of the things they did not determine. But they did say that "the votes shall then be counted." How? By the Clerk of the Senate? By the President of the Senate? By the Doorkeeper? By the Sergeant-at-Arms? By an experienced accountant who might be brought in for that purpose? By a committee of the two Houses, or by both Houses acting concurrently or in joint convention? It is not pointed out how the count shall be made.

But if Congress can legislate upon this subject in any way and provide the manner in which this count shall be made, it can provide such manner as in its judgment will be most effective to carry out the intention of the Constitution, which was to have the votes counted. This bill proposes to do that; and in either event—whether the Senate bill or the House bill be adopted—provides the mode. I do not know but it is competent to pass both these bills, so far as the constitutional power is concerned, except the second section of the Senate bill, which would, if passed into a law, deprive the Congress of the power which I believe was given to it to provide a mode in which this count should be made.

If Congress may make all laws which are necessary to carry into effect the powers granted by the Constitution, it may make such laws as it may deem necessary to carry out that express provision of the Constitution, to count the votes for President and Vice-President. How shall we provide that? That is a question addressed simply to the sound discretion of members of this House and of the Senate as lawmakers.

The honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HART] and the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] have suggested that this joint convention will be partisan, and that it will carry out the will of the majority of the members of the joint convention and not the will of the voters at the polls. They therefore distrust this body, consisting of four hundred and one members, as partisan and unreliable.

I am ready to concede that Congress is not infallible. I am satisfied that it has made a great many judgments and decisions in matters pertaining to elections which were partisan, and which ought not to have been made. But the question before us is: What kind of a body would most nearly represent the people of the United States and insure the most just and righteous decision upon a great question of this kind?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I wish before the gentleman passes from what he stated a few moments ago to be a defect in the Senate bill, to wit, that it provides a State tribunal for determining this question—I wish he would state whether in his opinion it would be dangerous or against the public policy to allow any State tribunal to have anything whatever to do with this question? I would remind him that in his argument he mainly dealt with the liability of the State to make an inferior or improper tribunal.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman did not get my point in reference to that second section of the Senate bill. I do not object to the State providing the manner in which the count shall be taken. What I objected to was this clause:

Every such determination made pursuant to such law so existing on said day, and made at least six days prior to the said time of meeting of the electors, shall be conclusive evidence of the lawful title to office of the electors who shall have been so determined to have been appointed, and shall govern in the counting of the electoral votes, as provided by the Constitution and as hereinafter regulated.

I object to that provision of the bill which requires Congress to abdicate its powers, which provides that a returning board of three men in Colorado or five or six men in Louisiana shall finally and forever control and settle the question as to who were chosen electors, when in my judgment Congress has the final power to count the votes.

Mr. HERBERT. Has the gentleman observed that the fourth section of the Senate bill gives to both Houses of Congress acting concurrently the power to overrule the decision of the State tribunal?

Mr. SPRINGER. I have not observed that, and I will call my friend's attention to the fact that he has not observed it. If the gentleman will look at that section he will find that when we come to the question of the disputed vote it is to be counted in accordance with the judgment of the State tribunal, if there was one.

Mr. HERBERT. Let me read from that section, beginning with line 31, near the bottom of page 3 of the bill:

When all objections so made to any vote or paper from a State shall have been received and read the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and such objections shall be submitted to the Senate for its decision; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall, in like manner, submit such objections to the House of Representatives for its decision; and no electoral vote or votes from any State from which but one return has been received shall be rejected except by the affirmative vote of both Houses.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then there is a provision of the section in relation to a case where more than one return or paper purporting to be a return from a State shall be received by the President of the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COX, of New York). The twenty minutes yielded to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. I did not know that I was limited to that time.

Mr. EATON. I ought to say that, according to the rule which has been adopted on both sides, my friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], as a member of the committee, would be entitled to an hour. He said he would not want over fifteen minutes and I gave him twenty.

Mr. SPRINGER. I thank the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON]. I will show my friend from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] that he is mistaken. If he will read further on in that section to which he has referred he will find this provision:

If more than one return or paper purporting to be a return from a State shall have been received by the President of the Senate, those votes, and those only, shall be counted which shall have been regularly given by the electors who are shown by the evidence mentioned in section 2 of this act to have been appointed, if the determination in said section provided for shall have been made; but in case there shall arise the question which of two or more of such State tribunals determining what electors have been appointed, as mentioned in section 2 of this act, is the lawful tribunal of such State, the votes regularly given of those electors, and those only, of such State shall be counted whose title as electors the two Houses, acting separately, shall concurrently decide is supported by the decision of the tribunal of such State so authorized by its laws.

So that if a State tribunal has determined the question the decision of Congress is referred back to that decision of the State tribunal which is made binding on the two Houses.

To proceed now with the argument I was about to make when interrupted by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS]. Is it safer to trust a joint convention of the two Houses, consisting of four hundred and one members, on a great national question of this kind, rather than to trust the decision of any returning board, or court, or commission that may be provided in any of the States of this Union? Let us look at the facts for a moment.

In 1876 it was understood two days after the election that if Mr. Hayes was elected President it was by but 1 majority of the electoral college, and that in order to get that 1 majority he must have all the votes of Louisiana, Florida, and South Carolina, which were contested. Now, suppose there had been a little Democratic State in the North—Oregon, for instance—and that this bill with its section 2 was the law. When it was discovered that the Republicans were going to count the votes of Louisiana, Florida, and South Carolina for their candidate, would not such a State call into requisition its little tribunal for the purpose of reversing the judgment of that State? It will be evident that there would be a race run immediately among the States, and especially the small States that had but few votes, where the returning board was easily manipulated, to register, or, in other words, to set aside, the voice of the people at the polls, and to procure a judgment of the electoral college against the voice of the people.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Is it not your idea that in such a case the race would be between the doubtful States in creating the tribunal?

Mr. SPRINGER. The tribunal must have been created beforehand.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I thought you overlooked that.

Mr. SPRINGER. No; I have stated frequently that this tribunal must have been in existence beforehand.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to know whether gentlemen here would in that case be willing to leave to the decision of one man, who might be a purchasable man and whose price might have been fixed and paid in dollars and cents, the determination of the great question who was elected President of the United States. Shall we rest the question upon so slender a thread, or will you in the case of a disputed election appeal to the representatives of the people and the representatives of the States, and ask them to settle it, and in this tribunal make every member of either House the equal of every other, and place him upon his individual responsibility before his constituents?

Mr. Speaker, under our form of government this House and the Senate—the Representatives here on this floor and the Senators in the other Chamber—are the people of the United States in their representative capacity. If you can not trust them in this representative capacity under the Constitution to decide a great question like this, to what body shall we go for relief? Where can we find in all our judicial, legislative, or executive system a body which when it has spoken will give so great satisfaction to the people in deciding a great question like this as will the Senate and the House of Representatives or the members of the Senate and the members of the House of Representatives?

I concede that we may act as partisans. I concede that we may err. I concede that we may commit a great outrage, as has been done in the past. But is it not better that this body and the Senate should err than that we should submit to the venal and the purchased decision of a small tribunal in a little State of the Union?

Mr. Speaker, I desire that in the selection of a President of the United States the voice of the people, whatever it may be, shall be respected. I desire that this voice shall be made effectual throughout the length and breadth of the land. And I know of no tribunal under our form of government that is more directly responsible to the people than are this body and the Senate. I know of no machinery which can be invented by the ingenuity of mankind whose judgment will be more likely to receive the acquiescence of the people than such a tribunal as this.

And, after all, acquiescence is the important thing. It is more important there should be acquiescence than that there should be entire freedom from partisanship or that there should be an absolutely correct judgment, because we have established a government which is intended to be perpetual, and history teaches us that most of the wars in the past have grown out of the succession of the head of the government. And if there is one place in our Constitution which is weaker and more vulnerable than any other, it is the provision with regard to the selection of the President of the United States.

Let us, therefore, as representatives of the people provide such machinery for securing this result that a judgment shall always be reached in the counting of the votes for that high office, a judgment which shall be acquiesced in by all the people of this country. If this tribunal, consisting of the representatives of the people on this floor and the representatives of the States in the Senate, should determine in any case that any man was rightfully elected President of the United States, I believe every good citizen will immediately bow in deference to that decision. To this end, Mr. Speaker, I commend this bill to the Representatives of the people, and ask them to provide such machinery for the counting of these votes and the rendering of this judgment as will insure justice, fair dealing, an honest count, and the perpetuity of our institutions.

Mr. PETERS addressed the Chair.

Mr. EATON. I do not suppose that a vote can be obtained to-night on this bill, because so many members are absent, though I should like (if it were possible) to close the discussion to-night, move the previous question, and take a vote. But I do not expect that; and I want gentlemen to go on now and talk as long as they please.

Mr. PARKER. One word as to the remark which the gentleman has just made. There are some gentlemen on this side—one or more—from whom we wish to hear on this question. Circumstances are such that we can not do so to-night. There might, if the gentleman wishes, be some limitation fixed now as to the discussion in the future, but reserving half an hour, or perhaps an hour, to this side upon the day on which the vote is taken. I really think, from the interest I have seen exhibited, and from incidental remarks I have heard, that this question ought justly to have the attention of this House for another full legislative day. In this remark I am not speaking for myself. But there are many gentlemen who have given careful consideration to this subject, and from whom we are entitled to hear. I hope the gentleman will not ask that the debate be closed to-day.

Mr. EATON. If this Congress is to adjourn by the 4th of July I greatly fear that we can not control another day for the discussion of this great question. I am as anxious as my friend from New York or anybody else that there should be full debate. I desired myself to discuss the question further for half an hour or an hour. Every member knows that in opening the debate I simply stated points without elaborating them. But I am entirely willing to forego the making of any speech on this subject. My object is that every member who desires may talk now, and that the previous question be called to-night.

Mr. BLAND. Allow me a moment. We had great difficulty to-day to reach this bill, and in all probability unless the previous question is moved we will not reach it again this session. If gentlemen wish to pass this bill at all, the only way is to pass it now. It has been discussed in and out of Congress since 1876, and we are ready to vote on the various propositions presented here. Certainly there can be no desire on the part of any gentleman to defeat this bill for want of time. We would all like to see some bill pass. It is uncertain whether we shall ever reach it again unless something is done in the way of moving the previous question.

Mr. HART. I hope there will be no present limitation to debate. Let it go on a little further.

Mr. BLAND. Debate has defeated most of the legislation at this session. Every bill is talked to death. We have been talking all the time, and yet gentlemen are not satisfied.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I hope we may be able to stand an hour or so yet this evening in discussion, and then I hope the demand for the previous question will be made. Unless something of that kind is done it will be impossible to get a vote on this question during this session of Congress. I would rather the worst bill the House could formulate should pass and go to the Senate and so go to conference than that none should pass.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, I labor under great disadvantage in addressing this House at so late an hour on Saturday evening, but perhaps I will receive as much attention to-night as I would have at any time during the session. Therefore I am perfectly willing to proceed.

There are two plans suggested by the bills before the House, and I desire to call attention briefly to them. The one plan proposed by the Senate bill, commonly known as the Hoar bill, is the plan of concurrent action between the two Houses or such action as preserves the autonomy of the two legislative bodies.

I will remark in advance of any further statement in relation to the subject involved that the primary underlying subject is what body is to act as the judicial power to determine a mooted question when it is raised in connection with the counting of the electoral votes? It is not what body shall count the vote, because that is a mere physical act or mathematical calculation and involves no great amount of skill, because our electoral vote never ran up high in figures. A boy of 10 who is familiar with the addition table could add up the electoral vote and do the counting. There is something deeper and more significant in the action that is required to be had by certain bodies than the mere counting of the vote, and that is to determine judicially what vote shall be counted when there shall be a dispute as to whether a vote shall be counted or not.

And coming back to my original proposition, I say the great question presented by these two bills is whether the two legislative bodies shall count these votes acting judicially as a Senate and House, or whether they shall count them as members of the two bodies, the Senate and House of Representatives. In other words, whether the Senate shall count or assist in the exercise of that judicial power as the Senate of the United States, or whether is shall assist in the exercise of that judicial power as individual members of the Senate, and whether the House shall exercise that judicial power in its capacity as the House of Representatives, or whether the members of the House of Representatives shall exercise that judicial power as individual members.

As I said before, the Hoar bill contemplates the preservation of the autonomy of these two bodies. It contemplates the Senate shall take part in this judicial proceeding as the Senate of the United States, and it contemplates the House of Representatives shall take part in this judicial proceeding as the House of Representatives of the United States, and their action must be concurrent on the question presented for their decision.

Now, in opposition to the Hoar bill is the substitute reported by the majority of the committee of the House, namely, that the power that shall exercise these official functions is not the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States, but the members of the House of Representatives and the members of the Senate voting per capita, in order to decide the mooted questions that may come before them for adjudication.

In order, Mr. Speaker, to ascertain the construction to be placed upon the Constitution it is necessary if possible to get at the intention of the framers in the preparation of that instrument. If that intent can be arrived at—the intent of the framers themselves—then I for one assert that I am willing to carry out that intention regardless of whether the conclusion so reached shall be favorable to the party to which I belong or adverse to its interests. I have sufficient confidence in the wisdom and knowledge and integrity of the fathers and in the deliberations given to this subject by the framers of the Constitution to believe that if you can arrive at their intention we will have arrived at a conclusion which will be for the best interests of the Government.

We know that prior to and during the Revolutionary war these now called States were independent and separate colonies. New York had no control over Georgia, had no interest in Georgia as a colony, exercised no power in Georgia as a colony; and it was not until they were brought face to face with a foreign foe, or with arms, that they were forced to acknowledge the necessity of a union, not for a general government, but in order to have strength to meet the dangers that threatened. The idea of a general government did not prevail prior to the Revolutionary war to any great extent.

It is true that Benjamin Franklin at some time prior to the Revolutionary war, and even after the very opening of the war, had spoken of the plan of a general government and the desirability of having such a Government. But it did not obtain throughout the colonies before the Revolutionary war or even during the war. The object of the Confederation during the Revolutionary war was simply for the purpose of forming a unity of strength and a power of resistance to throw off the yoke of Great Britain and relieve from its oppression. It was this oppression, as I said before, that disclosed the weakness of each separate part of the Confederation, and it was this oppression that begat the mutuality of feeling between the colonies, and naturally enough led to the idea so forcibly expressed in the language, "In union there is strength."

The Revolutionary war enforced this idea by creating throughout all of the colonies the prevalent feeling that if there was to be any maintenance of their rights upon this continent, that maintenance must be held and had by virtue of union among the colonies themselves; so that when, in May, 1787, the convention met in Philadelphia, composed of representatives from all of these colonies except Rhode Island, they met with all these views ingrafted into their very natures. They met prepared to go into a general government, to organize a general system of government that should make them strong and yet at the same time be elastic enough to fulfill the great hopes and promises of future growth and prosperity.

Coming, then, directly to the question of arriving at the intention of that convention, there are certain points about which there can be no difference of opinion. Any person who has familiarized himself with the brief synopsis of the debates that took place in the convention will arrive readily at a conclusion as to the intention of the framers of the Constitution in regard to a great many matters about which there can be no dispute; as, for instance, they were all agreed that it was necessary to have a head to this government. Every plan of government that was proposed in that convention recognized the idea that there must be a head to this government, and also recognized the idea that that head should be a president; because they were opposed to a king, they were opposed to a queen; they had had enough oppression from kings and queens, and did not desire a government to be controlled by one individual.

When they came to the manner of the election of this head, and when that question came to be discussed in the convention, it was then ascertained that there were differences of opinion as to how the selection should be made. There were some that were in favor of having the President selected by a popular election, but that this popular election should be confined to districts. Then there were others in favor of having the electors chosen by the States in proportion to their population. Then there were others in favor of having the President selected by the governors of the different States. There were others in favor of having primary electors chosen by the people; these primary electors to choose secondary electors, and these secondary electors to choose the President of the United States.

Then there were some who were in favor of choosing by a popular vote direct without the intervention of the district plan and without the intervention of the electoral plan. Then there were some, and these were in the majority, that were in favor of having the President elected by Congress; not by the House of Representatives, not by the Senate of the United States, not by the members of the House of Representatives, not by the members of the Senate of the United States, not by all of them combined, but by Congress. And I assert that an election by either branch of the Legislature or by the individual members of the Senate or of the House was not even mooted or advanced in that convention until during the last two weeks of its sitting. I have said, and it is a historical fact, that a majority of that convention were in favor of the selection of a President by Congress. Why do I make that statement? Any one who has taken these debates and run through them will discover that it was the most popular measure in that convention; and at one time the proposition to select a President by Congress passed that convention unanimously, although it was afterward reconsidered; but I will refer to this subject more at length in the course of my remarks.

I wish to call attention to certain paragraphs connected with article 2 of the Constitution. The second paragraph of section 1 of article 2 of the Constitution says:

Each State shall appoint—

There is the source of power. Who shall appoint?—

Each State shall appoint—

How shall they appoint?—

in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct—

How many shall they appoint?—

a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.

First, the power is in the State to select, and then there is the direction how they shall appoint or exercise this power. And there is a limitation upon the number.

We come then to the original third paragraph of section 1. And right here I call the attention of the House to this fact, that so far as arriving at the intent of this convention upon the subject under discussion is concerned, article 12, which was afterwards adopted in 1804, affords no criterion by which to judge other than that which was afforded by the original paragraph; because so far as the subject-matter under discussion is concerned it made no change. Both the original paragraph and article 12 used the words "and the vote shall then be counted;" but the original paragraph goes on to declare where these electors, after they have been selected by the appointing power, namely, the States, shall meet. Not in the national halls; not in the House of Representatives; not in the room occupied by the House of Representatives; not in the room occupied by the Senate of the United States; nor even in the national Capitol. But they—

Shall meet in their respective States and vote—

How?—

by ballot—

For whom? For two persons—for President and Vice-President.

What shall they do after they have voted? They shall make a list of all the persons voted for. They shall also state the number of votes that each person shall have received. They shall sign and certify that list and transmit it to the seat of the Government, directed to the President of the Senate. Now, these are specific directions. And mark you, when gentleman say that there were only general matters presented in this paragraph or in the Constitution as a whole, they overlook the fact that in relation to these matters the convention went into detail and stated plainly and unambiguously just what these electors should do and where the power that created them should come from.

Now, mark you, it says that this certified list should be sealed up and transmitted to the President of the Senate. Then, leaving out the immaterial matter of the paragraph that is not important to the discussion of the subject before us, we go on to the manner of choosing a President or the counting of this electoral vote:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

He shall not open only one set of certificates that may be transmitted to him by a State, but he shall open all of the certificates.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will the gentleman indulge me? Does the word "all" mean more than that he shall open the certificate of each State? For instance, suppose he receives an authenticated certificate from a State and he receives some other paper that purports to be a certificate, and upon examination he determines that one is the certificate of the State and the other is not, does he present both papers to the two Houses?

Mr. PETERS. I think that he does. For this reason: that under the law the President of the Senate is simply the custodian of these papers. He has no judicial power in connection with them. I think that the position that the President of the Senate has any judicial power in relation to these papers is untenable. And for this reason: if our forefathers intended that the President of the Senate should exercise judicial power in determining what votes should be counted they would have made some other person the custodian of those certificates between the time of the meeting of the electors and the counting of the electoral vote. And therefore I say that I believe the duty of the President of the Senate was to open all of the certificates that came into his possession and were placed in his hands as custodian of these certificates, regardless of whether there were two or more different certificates from any State. But that is a little diversion from the line of argument I had marked out.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. It is very important nevertheless. If I assume that he only lays before the two Houses the certificate of a State and that he must judicially determine, if necessary, which of two or more papers he may have is the certificate of the State, and that when he has laid a paper before the two Houses there is no power in the Houses to compel him to lay before them any other paper but the one, then the act of counting is merely ministerial, and the two Houses have not anything to do in a judicial way.

Mr. PETERS. I can not agree with the gentleman in regard to that, because I believe if the President of the Senate should fail to lay before the Senate and the House of Representatives all of the certificates he as the custodian had received, he could by law be compelled to do that duty, and this could not be done if he is authorized to exercise any judicial discretion. I do not think that he has any judicial power or discretion in the matter. His duties are purely ministerial. I believe that whenever he receives a paper from a State purporting to be a certificate, which paper has been transmitted to him as required by law, that is sufficient to authorize him to lay that paper before the Senate and the House of Representatives, and as the custodian of such papers and as a ministerial officer he is required to do so, and can be compelled by law to do so in case of refusal.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suppose that, as suggested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], this involves the whole question whether the President of the Senate makes the count, or whether he merely opens the certificate and some other body makes the count.

Mr. PETERS. I expect a little further on to take the position, which I firmly believe, as I have indicated and foreshadowed already in my remarks, that it is the Senate as a Senate and the House as a House acting concurrently that exercise the judicial power of determining what votes shall be counted. Nowhere in the Constitution is this duty expressly declared to be the duty of the President of the Senate; that is, the duty of exercising the judicial power as to what certificate shall be counted or as to the character of the certificates which he shall lay before the two Houses.

I regret very much that under the agreement which has been made to order the previous question to-night I have not time to argue this question fully and in detail. But I will pass very rapidly and come to the main question of the case as I desire to argue it.

What are the functions of Congress in this matter? There are four important factors in the election of a President: First, the people; second, the electors; third, the President of the Senate; and fourth, the Senate and the House of Representatives. These are all the powers or factors that are authorized by the Constitution of the United States to have anything to do with the election of a President from the beginning to the end.

After the electors have transmitted to the President of the Senate the certified copies of the votes, then their functions entirely cease; they have nothing further to do. Then, as I have already said, the function of the President of the Senate begins as the custodian of those records, certificates, or returns. When the Senate and the House meet, then the President of the Senate has a further function to perform, namely, to open all of the certificates, not open them secretly or privately in his office, but open them in the presence of the Senate and of the House of Representatives.

Now, as to certain functions of these different factors there can be no dispute. The only question of difference between the two plans under consideration is brought right down to this: By whom shall these votes be counted? Not in the mere sense of figuring up; but, as I have before stated, by whom shall the question as to what votes shall be counted be determined? As I have said, I do not believe that the President of the Senate has this power. I do not believe that the House of Representatives has this power, and I speak now of the House as contradistinguished from the Senate. I do not believe that the Senate has this power; I do not believe that the members of the House or of the Senate, or of both Houses, have this power.

But I believe that the Senate and House of Representatives concurrently have the power to determine what votes shall be counted, and I believe this for various reasons, which I shall endeavor briefly to give.

First, because the idea of the election of a President by Congress was the popular idea in that convention. Upon this I have already touched. There seems to have been three plans of government proposed in the convention—the Virginia plan, the Jersey plan, and the Pinckney plan. The Virginia plan and the Jersey plan both agreed upon the election of a President by Congress.

A strong effort was made to change this: to have the President elected by a popular vote, and that failed. Next there was a proposition presented to elect the President by electors, but that failed. The proposition to elect by Congress was at one time approved unanimously by the convention, as I have heretofore stated.

Then, on the 19th of July, 1787, that proposition was reconsidered, and the plan of choosing electors by the Legislatures of the States was adopted. Then, July 24, the proposition of choosing by electors was reconsidered and choice by Congress was again revived, and in that form the proposition went to the committee on details. It was favorably reported by the committee on details and was again recommitted, and finally, within the last two weeks of the session of the convention, the electoral system was agreed upon. This brief résumé of occurrences in that convention conclusively shows that the idea of electing the President by Congress was the popular idea in that convention and had the most adherents in that convention.

It is claimed, and correctly, too, that this electoral system was the result of a compromise. I agree to that. It was the result of a compromise between these parties who had different beliefs in regard to the method by which the President should be elected. The idea that the majority of a convention believing that the President should be elected by Congress should entirely abandon that plan and entirely surrender it and adopt something else is not in the nature of a compromise but in the nature of an entire surrender of their convictions.

Second. I believe that the Senate and the House of Representatives should determine judicially what votes shall be counted, because the Constitution provides that the certificates must be opened and counted in the presence of the Senate and of the House of Representatives. Will any man tell me what object there was in having the Senate and House of Representatives present when the certificates were opened, if it was not intended that they should have some right to exercise judicial power upon any mooted question that might arise in the counting of that vote?

I think the idea that the two Houses convene simply as witnesses is untenable. If that was the intention of the framers of the Constitution, why did they say that these votes must be counted in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives? Why did they not say that it should be done in the presence of the members of the Senate and the members of the House of Representatives? If that was the intention of the framers of the Constitution, if the members of the two Houses were to be convened simply as witnesses, it would naturally have been said that this opening and counting should be done in the presence of members of the Senate and members of the House of Representatives. An artificial body can not be a witness. The Senate of the United States is an artificial body; the House of Representatives is an artificial body. Artificial bodies can not be witnesses to anything. It is the members of these organizations who are witnesses, if they are convened simply in that capacity.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me to answer the point he is just making? I agree with him that the two Houses are present in their organized capacity, not as individuals. I will agree also, for the sake of argument, that they are not present to count the votes. But the Constitution explains precisely the object of their presence; there is no question about it. The purpose is written just as plainly as the makers of the Constitution could write it. The House is present so that, if the count should disclose the fact that no person has been elected President, it may at once take notice of the fact and proceed in the manner pointed out by the Constitution to elect a President; and the Senate is present for the purpose of hearing the announcement of the result, and in the event a Vice-President is not elected according to the method pointed out in the Constitution that the Senate may at once proceed to the election of a Vice-President. That is the object of the presence of the two Houses.

Mr. POLAND. Does the gentleman from Indiana claim that they have nothing to do with the count?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I claim that the Constitution does not confer upon the two Houses, either separately or acting together, any power with regard to determining the question of the count.

Mr. POLAND. Then, so far as the count is concerned, they are present as mere spectators?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Simply to hear the result.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman from Kansas will allow me to say that no President, from George Washington down, has ever yet been inaugurated except in conformity with a concurrent resolution of both Houses of Congress.

Mr. PETERS. I will come to a discussion of that matter a little further on if I have time. I think I have perhaps brought out plainly the idea that individual members of these bodies were not contemplated; that the framers of the Constitution had not in mind individuals but organized bodies; and it is these organized bodies that are by the Constitution to be assembled in the presence of the President of the Senate when these votes are counted.

Now, a majority of the members of the Senate duly assembled in the place where by law the Senate assembles constitutes the Senate of the United States, and a majority of the members of the House of Representatives duly convened according to law in the place for the meeting of the House of Representatives constitutes the House of Representatives. Will any man claim that the members of the Senate could meet in the city of Topeka, Kans., every one of them being there and having with them the Secretary of the Senate and all their other officers—could meet in a room there and be the Senate of the United States? Will any one claim that if every member belonging to this House, with all the officers of the House, should meet in the city of Topeka, Kans., they would constitute or could legally be called the House of Representatives of the United States? I trow not. It requires the sanction of law as well as the presence of individuals to make an artificial body. It requires the sanction of law as well as the presence of members of the House of Representatives to constitute in fact and in law the House of Representatives.

But I must consider for a moment the question whether the House of Representatives is the proper body to exercise this judicial power and count the vote. It is so claimed by some—among them I believe by the distinguished chairman of this committee [Mr. EATON], for whose opinions I have great reverence—that the House of Representatives is the body that should exercise the judicial power, if any is to be exercised, in the counting of this vote. Now, the only circumstance I can find in favor of that view is the fact that the House of Representatives in a certain contingency is called upon to elect a President.

If I had time I might suggest a number of reasons for the action of the framers of our national Constitution in adopting this provision, but I have not the time. It must be borne in mind that our forefathers, with their unhealed scars mutely reminding them of the tyranny from which they had just escaped, were in no frame of mind to lodge any extraordinary power in any particular body or in any particular man; and this, it seems to me, is the strongest reason for concluding that this power was not intended to be lodged by them in the hands of one man, the President of the Senate, or in either branch of the national Legislature.

How remarkable it would be if they had lodged this power in the House of Representatives! Under this view the House of Representatives exercises in the first instance the right to pass upon a mooted question in regard to the count, and in case they pass upon this mooted question in such a manner as to defeat the will of the people they themselves pass at once from the position of judges and become the electors to choose a President. In my opinion it is not reasonable to suppose that our forefathers, fresh as they were from scenes of oppression, fresh as they were from the battle-scars of the Revolution, contemplated any such idea as that.

But the idea that was more consonant with their feeling, as well as the text of the Constitution framed by them, was that the Senate and the House, the one acting separately from the other yet acting concurrently, the one being a balance and check on the other—that these two bodies should exercise this judicial power and determine this mooted question if any was to be determined.

The third reason why this power was intended by our forefathers to be lodged in the Senate and House of Representatives is because the act to be done is in its nature a judicial act. Bear in mind, all the time the prevalent feeling in that convention was that Congress should elect the President. Bear in mind also the intention of the framers of the Constitution in creating the Senate of the United States was to create a body that should be above and superior to the House of Representatives. That was the idea and intention of the framers of the Constitution. I have no doubt there was great reason for it. Do you believe they intended to submit to the House of Representatives alone such a great and important judicial question?

What is this House? It is nothing more than a rollicking mass meeting, that has no dignity except such as is given to it by the sanction of the law. The idea of our forefathers in creating the Senate was, it should be a check and balance on the House of Representatives. The House of Representatives was supposed to represent the popular will. It was supposed to come directly from the people. It was supposed it would be subject to public clamor. They created a body that was beyond it. They gave them longer tenure of office. They created them so they might be elected not by the people but by the Legislatures of the States, and for the purpose of standing between the House of Representatives and the other powers of this Government and keeping the House of Representatives from going to extremes.

Again, can you assert and claim that it was the intention of the framers of this Government that in determining so grave a question the Senate of the United States was simply to sit as idle spectators of that great event. I say here every conclusion of reason and of common sense that can be derived from a careful consideration of this subject leads directly up to the idea that the Senate and the House acting concurrently were to be the power to determine what vote should be counted in the event of a dispute, and that that was the object in having the Senate present.

I have already consumed longer time than I had expected on this question. I confess it is one of the most interesting which has been before this Congress. There is much more that had occurred to me to say in the progress of speaking, and many thoughts, suggestions, and ideas that had not occurred to me before have been suggested to me by the questions which have been asked, and I would have been glad to have had time to discuss them; but I have consumed more time than perhaps I ought to have consumed in this debate. I therefore yield the floor, reserving the balance of my time.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I feel the older members on this floor, who know more about the Constitution than I do, should be heard. I would rather hear them than be heard myself, and therefore I now yield my time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE].

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I only consent to talk a few moments at the conclusion of this discussion because I differ with those on both sides of the House who have preceded me. It has become a stereotyped expression, I believe, that the Government of the United States is one of express powers. It has none except those that are expressly conferred by the Constitution and such implied powers as are essential to the due execution of those which are expressed. When we find in the Constitution a power to do a thing there comes with it, by necessary implication, the power to equip the machinery by which the first power is to be executed. I give this position my approval. The Government is the creature of the Constitution and can only exercise the powers given it by that instrument.

Now, I desire to inquire where in this Constitution the power has been conferred upon the Congress of the United States to determine any question in connection with this count of the electoral vote. It is not contended by any gentleman here that the power has been conferred on the Senate acting separately from the House, or the House of Representatives acting separately from the Senate. But it is insisted that the two Houses, acting in some way either independently or concurrently or in joint convention, have something to do judicially in the determination of questions that may arise upon the count of the electoral vote. This I deny. The framers of the Constitution withheld from Congress the power to interfere with this count; they withheld it by not committing the power to it. When the Constitution confers a power it does so in express words, as Congress shall have power to borrow money, collect taxes, regulate commerce, coin money, and the like. By no words, by no implication, has the power been given Congress to settle questions concerning the electoral count. Turn to the second article, first section of the Constitution and from there to the twelfth amendment to the Constitution, and you will find that the only powers conferred upon Congress in this respect are, first, that it may fix the time for choosing the electors and the day on which they shall give their votes. That power is expressly given by the Constitution.

Next, it is provided that the count shall be had in the presence of both Houses. There is no question now about the right of the two Houses to be present at the count of the electoral vote. The Constitution goes further than this in its expressed powers. It provides that in a certain event it shall be the duty of the House of Representatives, in a manner particularly pointed out by it, to elect the President. It goes further, and confers upon the Senate of the United States the power in a certain exigency to elect the Vice-President, and these are all of the powers delegated by the Constitution to the Congress in this connection. I defy gentlemen to point to any others. So far as it may be essential to execute these expressed powers I admit that Congress has certain implied powers. It may provide the necessary means by which these expressed powers shall be executed. Let us see: Congress has the power, as I have said, to fix the time for choosing the electors and the day upon which they shall vote. Anything now that is essential to the execution of that power is legitimately within the sphere of Congressional action. This is not questioned.

The two Houses are required to be present, or at least it is the duty of the President of the Senate to open the certificates in the presence of the two Houses. There is no question about Congress having the power to provide the manner in which the Houses shall meet, the place at which they shall meet, the time when they shall meet, and the manner of adjournment. In these respects it may possibly, under this delegation of powers, have a right to provide. Indeed I do not doubt it.

But let us go a little further and see whether Congress under the Constitution has, by expressed grant or by implication, the power to take part in the actual counting of the votes. Now, it is not controverted that the election of President and Vice-President is to be made by electors chosen by the States in the manner provided by the State Legislatures. It is not controverted, further, that if the States fail to provide for the appointment of the electors Congress is powerless to compel them to execute the trust. The Legislature of the State may refuse to provide any method of appointment, and the Government of the United States in that regard is powerless. It has no remedy.

Or, again, the Legislature of the State having provided the method, and the electors having been designated in pursuance of the legislative plan may refuse to meet and cast their votes; and if they refuse to meet and vote, or if they refuse to meet at the place and vote at the time fixed by Congress, in either of these events the Government is powerless. The States in this way may destroy the National Government by their mere refusal to act. Congress can not compel the States to appoint electors nor the electors to act when appointed.

If the electors meet at the time appointed and cast their votes in the manner provided by the Constitution, but refuse to transmit them to the President of the Senate, the Government of the United States possesses no power under a writ of mandate or otherwise to compel the electors to send forward the vote; for that is the act of the State and within the jurisdiction of the State. Neither Congress nor the President of the Senate has power to act in any way until the vote shall be certified and transmitted to the custody of the President of the Senate. But it is true if any of the States fail to vote or to certify their votes that the votes of those States that do meet and comply with the requirements of the Constitution elect a President. Thirty-five States out of the thirty-eight may refuse to execute the power, and yet those States voting under the requirements of the Constitution would choose a President under this very provision of the Constitution.

I refer to these facts merely to show you that it was the purpose of the framers of the Constitution to submit the whole question of the election of the President to the States, and to keep it away from Congress. My distinguished friend from Kansas said the constitutional convention had two or three times during their deliberations decided that the President should be elected by the House of Representatives——

Mr. PETERS. No; by Congress.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I beg the gentleman's pardon; by Congress I should have said. It is true, and they as repeatedly retreated from that position for the very reason I have attempted heretofore to give, that it was dangerous to submit this great power to a political body such as the Congress of the United States. The fathers saw that partisan feeling and partisan prejudices would enter into the deliberations of Congress. The fathers, inspired by the gift of prophesy, looked down through the years, and saw that the time would come when the executive patronage would be enormous, and when it would be dangerous to submit the great question of selecting a chief magistrate of the Republic to a political body interested in the distribution of the spoils. For that reason they retreated from this proposition to submit this election to the Congress of the United States; and when the proposition was made in the convention to submit it to an election by the people, there was but a part of one out of the twelve States represented in that convention that gave its preference to that method of selecting the President.

The convention by a decisive vote refused to submit the choice of electors to a vote of the people. It did not intend that the people should choose the President.

I want to say to my friends that as democratic as were the fathers they distrusted the people. James Madison, as good a Democrat as he was, said it would be dangerous to commit the suffrage to any but the property-holders, the freeholders, for the time would come when a very large majority of the people would be propertyless, and when that time came, when the propertyless became the ruling class in this country, one of two things would happen: either they would combine to destroy property and the rights of property, or they would be bought by the affluent and made the mere tools of opulence. That was his prediction.

Mr. PETERS. May I ask the gentleman was it not contemplated by our forefathers in this convention at one time to base the Senate upon a property qualification, and that the House should be elected by a certain class of voters on a limited suffrage, as was their original idea? And was not that a strong reason in favor of the idea that they intended that the Senate and House should act together; in other words, that the body to be elected on a property qualification should act with the other body in determining this matter?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I think my friend is right in the historical fact, although I may differ with him as to the conclusion he reaches.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. HISCOCK. As I understand, he contends that both these bills are unconstitutional?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. HISCOCK. Now, there has been a diversity of opinion on this great constitutional question. It has been in the arena of debate and of legislation. It is true, is it not, that in 1865 both branches of Congress asserted this power?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Yes, sir; in the twenty-second joint rule.

Mr. HISCOCK. In the twenty-second joint rule they both asserted this power. They also both asserted this power, and it was recognized by the President in the electoral-count bill. Now, the question I ask my friend is this: With all these decisions since 1864 on this question by Congress, which seems to be the highest tribunal to which we can address ourselves, is the question still an open one?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. In other words, the gentleman asks whether it is not res judicata?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes; whether it is res judicata, or whether it is a question open for discussion now, after having been acquiesced in by this Government for twenty years?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I never knew any question was foreclosed by the action of Congress. But notwithstanding the statement of the gentleman, the constitutionality of the Electoral Commission and the twenty-second joint rule have always been challenged and will always be challenged until the Constitution is amended.

Mr. HISCOCK. The argument I make is this: that an acquiescence for twenty years by the highest tribunal that can pass upon a question of that kind is such an acquiescence as to foreclose the question.

Mr. EATON. My friend from Indiana says he did not know the question to be foreclosed. I suppose he particularly referred to the fact that the persons who got up the twenty-second joint rule abrogated it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Now I will take the thread of my argument, if I can find it. It is enough to say of the twenty-second joint rule that it was always constitutional in the opinion of the party that under its provisions could control the count. The other party never assented to it. But I was attempting to show by the action of the constitutional convention that the fathers were not so democratic as some seem to think; that they did not intend to let the President be elected either by Congress, or by the people, or by electors to be chosen by the people. That proposition was made in the constitutional convention, but was voted down by an overwhelming majority; so we are forced to the position I assumed a few moments ago, which is, that this election of the President of the United States is to be an election by States.

But I may be asked, why is this important here and how does it aid us in interpreting the Constitution? I answer, as the architects of this instrument intended the States, by their electors, to choose the President without interference on the part of the Government, they made no provision for Congressional action until it was ascertained by a count of the vote that the States had made no choice. Then and then only does the Government by its Congress begin to act. After reaching this point the Constitution is explicit. It then proceeds to say, in unambiguous language, what shall be done by the Senate and what by the House. Before the count is had it is only provided that the President of the Senate shall, "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open the certificates and the votes shall then be counted." Will any one seriously contend that the fathers would have chosen such language had they intended to confer on Congress the power to try judicially or otherwise the important questions that might arise before declaring the result of the electoral vote? If it was intended that Congress should try a contested Presidential election—the highest and gravest duty that could have been imposed upon it—it is passing strange that the makers of the Constitution not only did not say so, but left the whole question, to say the least, in doubt. Had the convention intended Congress to assume this immense responsibility it would have given expression to that purpose in unmistakable language. I insist that its failure to do this is strong, if not conclusive, evidence that it had no such purpose.

I need not say to you gentlemen who have thought over this question and have discussed it that the idea of the fathers was that these electors should be selected in a manner to be provided by the States; that they were not to be the choice of a party caucus or a party convention, but were to be selected because of their intelligence and integrity and high personal standing; and that these men were not to be instructed, but left perfectly free to exercise their own deliberate judgment in the election of a President and Vice-President of the United States. It was an excellent idea; and I sometimes regret that the spirit of that intention of the fathers has not been carried out. But our system of election is a deliberate departure from the electoral idea, and the electoral plan is now not only full of difficulties but full of peril to the Republic.

It never entered into the conception of the framers of the Constitution that within a very few years we would remit this question of appointment to a popular vote. Had the fathers foreseen that this would have been the result it would have been prohibited by the Constitution they made. Then these persons, if they were thus selected and were permitted thus to choose a President of the United States, and were, as I have said, left perfectly free to make this choice without party or caucus dictation, when they voted their choice they could be arraigned before no tribunal for having violated party instructions or party confidence. We have permitted that idea to stand in the electoral system from that day to the present. If we elect Democratic electors the Constitution imposes upon them no obligation to vote for the Democratic candidates. If they disobey their instructions they commit no crime against the Constitution, nor can you formulate a law under which they can be punished for this independent action without violating the spirit of the Constitution. But I do not intend to dwell upon that point.

Suppose the electors have been duly appointed. They vote. The certificates of election have been transmitted to the President of the Senate, and he, the President of the Senate, has become the custodian of these certificates. What certificates? Every paper that may be sent to him? No. Will any gentleman contend that that is what the Constitution means? That if John Smith certifies that Tom Jones and Peter Green and Billy Wiggins have been elected as electors from the State of Connecticut and transmits that paper in some way to the President of the Senate, he must regard it as a certificate, to be kept by him and opened by him and laid before the two Houses when they meet under the Constitution? I presume nobody insists upon such a proposition.

Then what certificates are transmitted to him? The certificates of the action of the electors of the States in choosing a President and a Vice-President, as certified by the States. It is the certified action of the State; that is the certificate that goes to him and no other. Of that he becomes custodian. He becomes the custodian of nothing else. He can accept nothing else. He could not be the legal custodian under the Constitution, or constitutional custodian of any other paper than the certificate of the State transmitting to the Congress of the United States—if you please to put it in that way—the action of the agents of the State in the selection of President and Vice-President. To say that the President of the Senate must accept and open and lay before the two Houses all papers purporting to be certificates of States, or certificates of electoral colleges, is equivalent to saying that this high and solemn proceeding shall be converted into a miserable farce.

Now, the President of the Senate is to open the certificates. What is meant by the word "open?" Does it mean that he is then for the first time to break the seals of those certificates in the presence of the two Houses; that he must keep the envelopes closed until the two Houses meet together, and then is to open them in their presence? I undertake to say that the opening of the certificates means, in the legal and constitutional sense, the giving out of their contents, the making known the action of each of the States, as made manifest by the vote of its electors.

But you may put it the other way, if you please—that he must break the seals for the first time in the presence of the two Houses. Then I assert that when he opens the certificates in the presence of the two Houses he opens only those which contain the votes of the electors appointed by the States. Am I right about that? If he goes beyond that, how far may he go and where must he stop?

Suppose that, in some way or other, he has two papers, each of which purports to be from a State. I assume that as the Constitution makes it his duty to open in the presence of the two Houses simply the legal certificate of the State, he must determine the question as to which of those two papers is that certificate. And why? Not only because the Constitution imposes upon him the duty of laying the true certificate, the certificate, before the two Houses, but you may examine the Constitution in vain to find the power committed to anybody else to determine which is the true certificate. As he must open the vote of the electors only, he must of necessity ascertain which certificate contains that vote.

I ask you gentlemen, who are seeking to find the powers of the Government in the Constitution, to point out the place where any other tribunal, the Senate or the House, or both of them, can exercise a single judicial function in connection with the certificate after it has been opened, or a single judicial function in connection with it before it has been laid before the two Houses.

I admit that the Constitution does not expressly, in words, if you please, confer the power upon the President of the Senate to count the vote. When I say it does not expressly confer that power, I simply mean to say that it is not conferred in so many words; that is all I intend to say.

Let us see what the Constitution does say. As I said before, the President of the Senate is made the custodian of these electoral votes. He is the only person under the Constitution who can open them, or who can determine which of two papers from a State is the legal certificate of that State. It is transmitted to him, and it is his duty to lay such certificate before the two Houses.

I undertake to say that but the one certificate, and that the true legal certificate of the State, which he has ascertained, and which it has been made by the Constitution his duty to ascertain, can he lay before the two Houses Now, if he has done that, if he has laid simply the certificates of the States, the real votes of those States, before the two Houses, what is there then to do? Whoever may do it, whether it be the act of the two Houses or the act of the President of the Senate, what is to be done except the mere ministerial act of adding up the votes?

And that is the reason, let me say to you, that in my opinion the framers of the Constitution made no mention of the important question as to who should determine the eligibility of the elector or the propriety of an electoral vote. Can it be possible that while the fathers provided the manner in which the two Houses should meet, while they provided the manner in which each should elect, the one the President and the other the Vice President, in case those officers had not been elected by the electoral vote—is it possible that the fathers went into the details on those questions, providing specifically the manner in which the two Houses should act in making selections for those particular offices, and yet they left out the important question, if it was intended to confer the power upon the two Houses at all, of the manner in which the two Houses should exercise the power of determining the eligibility of an elector or the legality of an electoral vote? Sir, it was not anticipated by the fathers that such a question could in the nature of things arise. Let the President of the Senate determine all the questions committed to him, and this whole subject is relieved of its embarrassments.

I have assumed that as the President of the Senate is the custodian of these certificates, he is simply required to lay before the two Houses, when they have met together, the actual, legal certificate of the action of each State. He is bound to do that, and as a matter of course he has the power to determine if he has two papers coming from any one State which one of the two is the legal certificate. In the event he makes this choice, then there can be but one certificate from that State to be laid before the two Houses. And then the two Houses, if they are present for any purpose connected with the counting of the votes, are simply by their tellers to add up the votes, and the result is to be declared.

Some gentlemen say, is it possible that the two Houses are there simply to be witnesses? Is it very important, they say, that the two Houses should be there simply for that purpose; and it would be unimportant if they were there for no other purpose. What purpose?

A President of the Republic has been elected, and his election is to be declared. I do not care by whom the declaration is to be made. It seems to me to be a matter of the utmost propriety that the declaration should be made before the supreme legislative power of the nation. But the two Houses are not present simply to be witnesses: They are there for another purpose, and the Constitution expressly states it. There is an express declaration in the Constitution of the purpose for which the Senate and the House of Representatives are present when the votes are opened and counted. It is this: If, when the electoral votes have been counted, no candidate has received a majority of all of them for the Presidency, the House shall immediately proceed to elect a President. If, in the same manner, no one has received a majority of all the votes for Vice-President, then the Senate shall immediately proceed to elect the Vice-President. The two Houses are present to see whether or not this exigency happens; and if it does happen, they are present that they may immediately exercise the power conferred on them by the Constitution of the United States, so that the Government, by the failure of the electors to elect a President or Vice-President, shall not lapse, but that the two Houses in the constitutional way shall proceed to elect respectively these officers of the Government.

Gentlemen say that it was certainly never intended to give to the President of the Senate so grave a power. We can only judge intentions by looking to the language of the instrument. But to me it is clear that the convention expected most, if not all of these questions, to be settled by the States. I have no time to make more than a suggestion here—its fuller presentation must be left to the future.

I am, however, not willing to admit that the power to try a contested Presidential election is less safe if exercised by the President of the Senate than if left to Congress. An officer of the law, one man, vested with a grave public duty, whose action is under the eye of all, who is answerable to all parties, is, in my opinion, less likely to commit a crime against constitutional government and the liberties of the people than a tribunal where the responsibility is divided among a large number, and especially when that body is partisan, and acts at the dictation of and is backed by a strong and well-organized political party.

Now, gentlemen, in conclusion let me say the reason I have talked upon this subject is not because I am unwilling to submit to a twenty-second joint rule or to an act of legislation incorporating that idea. I would a thousand times rather see the Constitution of the country violated in this respect and by the passage of this bill than see this grand Republic of 55,000,000 of freemen, the light and the hope of the world, wrecked by a collision of parties and by fratricidal war. I say I would waive any constitutional objection I have on this subject—I would vote for an electoral commission or any kind of a commission—in order to save this Government of ours for the ages. I beg to assure you, sir, to assure the House and the country, that I prefer this bill, unwise, partisan, and unconstitutional as I believe it to be, to such a collision as this vexed question, if unsettled, may some time provoke.

I have spoken on this question to admonish you gentlemen on the other side. Let me say just a plain word to you. While your bill puts it in your power by this joint convention to count in the next President; while the bill gives you that advantage if you desire to exercise the power, for you would have a majority of 70 or 75 in the joint convention, yet when that time comes you may be confronted by this constitutional view which I have presented and which I believe to be the true interpretation of the Constitution. You may find a President of the Senate who will accept the responsibility of counting this vote, and may the good Lord save us from any such conflict as our honest differences may bring. I hope to avoid all controversy by settling these questions in advance. I have only alluded to that matter because I desire to impress every member with the fact that this is the most important subject that has been or can be considered by this Congress; and I am surprised that the wisdom and patriotism of the two Houses of Congress have not brought them together upon some common ground on which all parties and all patriotic men can stand. I moreover desired to impress on the House that there are strong reasons for believing that the President of the Senate has the right to count the Presidential vote, and that although those who entertain these views may be willing to compromise them for harmony, they may not willingly surrender them to a measure so purely partisan as is this bill.

Mr. EATON obtained the floor.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. If my friend from Connecticut will yield a moment I desire to make a single remark. I am very glad to have had the pleasure of yielding my time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE]. I did not know what line of argument he would pursue, but I am delighted to know that he has expressed my views so much better than I could have done myself.

I will only add that as a member of the committee I do not approve, as the chairman of the committee well knows, either of the bills now under consideration. Rather than accept either of these bills, I prefer to take the Constitution as it is, with all the dangers that may confront us.

Mr. JORDAN addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HERBERT. Will the gentleman from Connecticut yield to me that I may send up an amendment upon which he may also ask the previous question?

Mr. EATON. I yield for the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the amendment sent up by the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the event that the House substitute is defeated, amend section 2 of the Senate bill by inserting, in line 8, between the words "shall be" and the word "conclusive," the words "unless overruled by the concurrent action of the Senate and the House of Representatives."

Mr. EVERHART. I desire to offer an amendment to the substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania desires to have read an amendment, that it may be considered as pending.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 3 of the substitute, after the word "vote," in the fourth line, insert "the House of Representatives voting by States, each State having two votes, and the Senate voting per capita;" so that it shall read:

"And the joint convention shall then proceed to vote, the House voting by States, each State having two votes, and the Senate voting per capita."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection this amendment will be considered as pending.

There was no objection.

Mr. PETERS. I have some amendments to submit to the substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the substitute pending?

Mr. EATON. It is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be considered as pending.

Mr. PETERS. I submit the following amendments to that substitute:

First amendment: In line 1 of section 3, after the word "Congress," insert "and the Supreme Court of the United States." In line 3 of section 3, at the commencement of the line, insert "the Supreme Court of the United States."

Second amendment: In line 1 of section 4, on page 9, strike out the figure "4" and insert "5." In line 4, after the word "left," insert "the members of the Supreme Court in the body of the Hall, on the left of the presiding officer."

Third amendment: In line 40, on page 8, strike out all of section 3 after the word "Senate," and insert the following: "Then those votes, and those only, shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall concurrently decide to be the lawful votes of the legally appointed electors of such State. When the two Houses have voted, they shall immediately again meet, and the presiding officer shall then announce the decision of the question submitted. When the two Houses separate to decide upon an objection that may have been made to the counting of any electoral vote or votes from any State, or other question arising in the matter, each Senator and Representative may speak to such objection or question five minutes, and not more than once; but after such debate shall have lasted two hours it shall be the duty of the presiding officer of each House to put the main question without further debate."

Fourth amendment: Add the following as an additional section, to be numbered section 4: "In case of a disagreement between the two Houses upon any question submitted to them separately, as hereinbefore provided, then a committee of conference of like number and in like manner as in a disagreement upon any legislation, shall be appointed, which committee shall forthwith meet, and after a session of not more than two hours shall report the result of their conference to the respective Houses. Should the two Houses fail to agree upon the disputed question the committee of conference shall again meet, and shall forthwith present the disputed question to the Supreme Court of the United States, who, after one hour's argument on the part of the Senate and one hour's argument on the part of the House, shall forthwith decide the question presented, and such decision shall be binding upon the Senate and the House of Representatives."

Mr. EATON. I now demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. PARKER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is not the status of the question that the Senate bill is pending and the bill reported by the committee is pending as a substitute for it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is under the impression that is the situation, but in the absence of the Speaker will not undertake to decide.

Mr. HERBERT. That is the condition of the question.

Mr. EATON. I have been requested by two or three gentlemen to ask that such members as may desire to print remarks on this subject may have permission to do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 2677) granting a pension to Miss Mary P. MacBlair.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 4701) to change the times of holding the district and circuit courts of the United States in the northern district of Georgia;

An act (H. R. 6933) to authorize the National Academy of Sciences to receive and hold trust funds for the promotion of science, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 4988) to remove the disabilities of William H. Parker, of Virginia, incurred under the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 257) providing for the printing of the last annual report of the Commissioner of Education; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 235) to print additional copies of certain publications.

MRS. ELIZA W. PATTERSON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I have permitted House bill No. 4689, entitled "An act for the relief of Eliza W. Patterson," to become a law by withholding action upon it for ten days after it was presented to me.

The affairs and interests of the District of Columbia are committed to Congress as its legislature. I do not question the constitutional right of Congress to pass a law relieving the family of an officer, in view of the services he had rendered his country, from the burdens of taxation, but I submit to Congress that this just gift of the nation to the family of such faithful officer should come from the national Treasury rather than from that of this District; and I therefore recommend that an appropriation be made to reimburse the District for the amount of taxes which would have been due to it had this act not become a law.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 21, 1884.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. GRAVES, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. CLARDY, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. MATSON, for one week, on account of important business.

And then, on motion of Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ELDREDGE: Petition of Woodbury Post, No. 45, Department of Michigan, asking a pension for all Union soldiers of the late war who served sixty days or more—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GLASCOCK: Memorial of W. W. and Emma R. Wirt, sole survivors of John L. Wirt, who was wounded in the official discharge of his duties on the floor of the House of Representatives—to the Committee on Accounts.

By Mr. HARMER: Petitition of W. F. Potts relative to the extension of certain letters patent—to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. H. H. HATCH: Resolution of Lockwood Post, No. 139, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Michigan, relative to pensions, &c.—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LOWRY: Memorial relating to the claim of James McCabe—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. S. H. MILLER: Petitions of citizens of Titusville, of Brookville, of Brownsville, of Connellsville, of Corry, of Franklin, of New Castle, of Warren, of Uniontown, of Union City, of Sharon, of Renovo, of Mercer, of Meadville, of Kittanning, of Greenville, and of Pittsburgh, Pa., and of citizens of Fredonia, N. Y., remonstrating against Government control of the telegraph—severally to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. MORGAN: Memorial of the Saint Louis Academy of Science against the bill for the discontinuance of the Coast Survey—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. RANDALL: Three petitions of members of the Grand Army of the Republic, praying for the establishment of a national cemetery near Philadelphia—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. YOUNG: Petition of E. M. Massey for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, petitions relating to the claims of Mrs. Caroline H. Renney, executrix, &c., of William W. Goodwin, administrator, &c., of Merirt Harris—severally to the Committee on War Claims.

SENATE.

MONDAY, June 23, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

ELIZA W. PATTERSON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

I have permitted House bill No. 4689, entitled "An act for the relief of Eliza W. Patterson," to become a law by withholding action upon it for ten days after it was presented to me.

The affairs and interests of the District of Columbia are committed to Congress as its Legislature. CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 21, 1884.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am requested to present the petition of George S. Coe, president of the American Exchange Bank, Arthur B. Graves, president of the St. Nicholas Bank, William Dowd, president of the Bank of North America, and other bankers, merchants, and capitalists of New York, praying that this Forty-eighth Congress authorize the Secretary of War to contract with Charles Stoughton and his associates for the entire work of improving the Harlem River, New York, for a sum not exceeding $1,295,000, including the furnishing the right of way free of cost to the United States, the work to be completed by July 4, 1886. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I also present a memorial signed by a large number of business men, lawyers, and others, of the city of Toledo, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the bill now pending before the Judiciary Committee relative to jurisdiction of United States courts in certain cases. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON presented the memorial of Marsh and Harwood Company and E. Grasselli & Sons, of Cincinnati, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the bill for the construction of certain bridges across Staten Island Sound; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLATT presented additional papers to accompany the bill (S. 2334) for the relief of Sigmund Bauer; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONGER presented resolutions adopted by Lockwood Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Alpena, Mich., in favor of legislation as recommended by the general pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAWLEY presented the memorial of Franklin Rives, of Washington, D. C., for himself and for the heirs of Jefferson Rives, offering to the Government an additional building for the accommodation of the Government Printing Office; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7034) to increase the salary of the clerk of the Court of Alabama Claims, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 715) to compensate physicians for services rendered under an order of the United States court of the northern district of Alabama, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4411) to amend section 101 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to allow the chairman of a subcommittee of a committee of either House of Congress to administer oaths, reported it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 3307) granting a pension to Harriet P. Dame;

A bill (H. R. 6542) granting a pension to Harriett S. Brisbine; and

A bill (H. R. 1751) for the relief of William R. Browne.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BECK introduced a bill (S. 2335) to amend section 3330 of the Revised Statutes, relative to the export of distilled spirits; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LAPHAM introduced a bill (S. 2336) to facilitate the bridging of Raritan Bay, Arthur Kull, and Kill von Kull; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2337) for the relief of Thomas Farthing and Matilda Farthing as executrix of George Farthing, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PLATT (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2338) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Mary McIntosh, widow of First Lieut. Donald McIntosh, Seventh Cavalry, United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 2339) to authorize the appointment of a commission of naval architects and marine engineers to examine and report upon new designs for steamships; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

DEPARTMENTAL INVESTIGATION.

Mr. HALE. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Expenditures be, and is hereby, directed to investigate the recent defalcations of disbursing officers in some of the Departments in Washington and the alleged frauds upon the Government by means of false vouchers in the Navy Department, and to inquire into the system adopted by such Departments for making disbursements and purchases of supplies, with a view to determine whether it embraces sufficient safeguards against defalcations and frauds; and said committee is authorized to sit during the vacation of Congress, and shall have power to send for persons and papers in the course of its investigation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks that the resolution be now considered.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator mentions in his resolution, as I understand it, making investigation into some of the Departments without naming them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read.

Mr. HALE. Let it be read. I think the Senator from Alabama will not object when he hears it read.

The resolution was read.

Mr. HALE. What is the title of the committee as given in the resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Let the Chief Clerk read the title of the committee.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Expenditures——

Mr. HALE. That should be changed so as to read, "the Committee on Expenditures of Public Money." That is the committee which for the first time in the history of the Senate exists for the purpose of conducting such examinations. I will say to the Senator from Alabama that I used the language "defalcations of disbursing officers in some of the Departments in Washington" without naming them specifically because lately there have been defalcations in some of the Departments, and I did not wish to particularize or to limit the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Maine will be modified as he has suggested in respect of the title of the committee referred to in it, and the question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope that the Senator from Maine will include the Post-Office Department in his resolution so that the investigation may extend to that as well as to the Navy Department.

Mr. HALE. I have used the language applying to defalcations in some of the Departments so as to cover the Post-Office Department, the State Department, and one of the other Departments, and then I mention also in terms the alleged false vouchers in the Navy Department, covering the matters that have been lately in the press and are in the public mind. I intend that the resolution shall be all-embracing, so that the committee can cover anything. I had the Post-Office Department in mind.

Mr. MORGAN. If that is the intention of course I have no objection to it. That was my purpose.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Maine if it would not be wise to make the resolution sufficiently broad to cover the methods of keeping the accounts in all the Departments? If there is an error in method in one Department that enables defalcations to take place, possibly the same error exists in the method of keeping accounts in other Departments. While the committee are at work upon that subject would it not be well to make it broad enough to cover every matter of investigation as to methods everywhere?

Mr. HALE. I may have been unhappy in the selection of my language, but my object in drawing the resolution was to cover precisely that, and have the committee not only report upon the alleged frauds and defalcations and false vouchers, but also to report whether there are sufficient safeguards now with reference to the accounts and with reference to the manner of purchasing to protect the Treasury. In fact, I think from my experience on some of these committees before that the chief work of the committee will be in elaborating and preparing and reporting to the Senate a system under which the Government and the Treasury may be protected with reference to the purchases here in Washington. They are small in amount compared with the great expenditures of the Treasury, but they need to be looked after with a scrutinizing and jealous eye.

Some new plan ought to be adopted in all the Departments in reference to the purchases here in Washington. I became convinced of that in an investigation that I took part in two years ago. The time has come when the evil ought to be corrected, and I seek to correct it in this resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear the resolution read again.

Mr. WILSON. I ask that the resolution be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be again reported.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I find from the reading of the resolution that it is limited to "such Departments" after enumerating the Departments. It seems to me as though it would confine the investigation of the committee to the Departments named in the resolution. I move to strike out the words "such Departments," and insert "all the Departments."

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the resolution so as to read:

And to inquire into the system adopted by all the Departments of the Government for making disbursements and purchases of supplies.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest that if the committee is to pursue the investigation during the recess, the resolution should give to the committee authority to employ a clerk or stenographer, as the clerk of the committee is only under pay during the session of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Then, after the words "shall have power to send for persons and papers in the course of its investigation," I move to add the words:

And to employ a clerk and stenographer when needed; and the expenses of the same shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to inquire whether, as the resolution now reads, it would require the committee to be in session as a full committee or whether the committee would be authorized to sit by a subcommittee? There are members of the committee who would certainly, I think, be unable to devote a great deal of time to this business during the recess, and I suppose a subcommittee could discharge the duty which is assigned to the committee, perhaps just as well as the full committee.

Mr. HALE. I did not intend to go into all of the detail of the conduct of the investigation. I presumed that after it should be set on foot, if the committee find that its work should be conducted in whole or in part by a subcommittee as they developed a need of that, at any time during the session the committee itself can come in and will have no difficulty in getting the leave of the Senate; but I did not propose in starting the investigation to go into all of these details. I have no objection to their being gone into, but that was not my purpose. The committee can regulate that afterward by leave of the Senate, if they find the need of it.

Mr. PLATT. In view of that suggestion, I shall not suggest any change at the present time.

Mr. INGALLS. There must be some radical defect in the system of keeping departmental accounts which permits a series of peculations and misappropriations of public funds to go undetected for years. If the resolution is not broad enough in terms to direct the Committee on Expenditures of Public Money to make their examination minute and thorough, I hope it will be so amended as to enable them to make the most comprehensive and searching inquiry. I am satisfied that the Senator from Maine would so desire; and it was with some regret that I heard him say that this subject was one that was to be determined upon in its scope and general outline hereafter by the action of the committee.

I trust, sir, that the Senate will see the importance of directing an examination to be made which will be comprehensive and minute to the last particular, and that it shall not be confined merely to those instances in which defalcations or irregularities have already been discovered, but shall be so far-reaching as to relieve the apprehension in the public mind that there may be still greater irregularities yet undetected. If the resolution offered by the Senator from Maine does not include that, then I shall ask that it may be so amended that the direction will be absolute to the committee.

Mr. HALE. If I said what I intended to say it was this: that I thought the great work of the committee, its most important functions under the investigation, would be to go thoroughly into the whole system of purchases under which the fraudulent vouchers have been made and passed heretofore, and report fully and exhaustively upon such errors, irregularities, and frauds as are discovered, and to report a method of correcting it. I think that is the largest work the committee will have to do.

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment I will suggest to him that the greatest irregularities which have been discovered have not been in connection with the purchase of supplies in the District. Take the defalcation in the Post-Office Department. The difficulty there arose from the system which is pursued in regard to the deposit of the appropriation for the payment of the monthly expenditures of that Department in the hands of the disbursing clerk. There was no connection whatever with the purchase of supplies in that particular, except that subsequently it did appear that certain moneys derived from sales of unused and waste property in the Department had failed to be accounted for.

Mr. HALE. All of that is embraced. The defalcations in any of the Departments of the Government are to be looked into, and I should have no doubt that the committee in reporting upon safeguards, upon guarantees, upon checks to be put in the way of the business of the Departments, will cover all these things. I certainly intended that; and I am very glad that the debate has arisen, because the committee under it, I think, will take notice that they shall make a thorough examination and report so that defalcations, deficits, false vouchers, substitution of false vouchers, shall all be considered, and their recurrence prevented so far as we can prevent it by statute enactment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

REPORT ON ALLEGED ELECTION OUTRAGES IN VIRGINIA.

Mr. LAPHAM. I offer the following resolution and ask for its present consideration:

Ordered, That there be printed for the use of the Senate, at a cost not to exceed $500, the majority report, together with the views of the minority, of the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections in regard to the alleged election outrages at Danville, in the State of Virginia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has it been referred to a committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does it not have to go to the Committee on Printing under the rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is in doubt. It provides for a print, and does not speak of extra copies. It limits the expense to $500, and so does not require a concurrent resolution. On the face of it, it is not a resolution which, the Chair is under the impression, requires a reference, as it does not purport to be a resolution for extra copies.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the resolution be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. JONAS. I notice that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] who prepared the minority report is not in his seat, and I therefore object to the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is objected to, and goes over until to-morrow.

Mr. LAPHAM. I will state to the Senator from Louisiana that the Senator from North Carolina concurs with me in the proposal of the resolution.

Mr. JONAS. If that is the case I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection of the Senator from Louisiana is withdrawn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state also, if the Chair will allow me, that these reports having been ordered separately, at different times, they are not brought together. The resolution proposes only to print five hundred dollars' worth of the two reports, not the evidence but the two reports together.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask whether any portion of the matter has been put in type?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is all in type.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then the usual 1,950 copies have been printed?

Mr. LAPHAM. They were printed separately.

Mr. HAWLEY. You wish to have five hundred dollars' worth of the joint report printed?

Mr. LAPHAM. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to it.

The resolution was agreed to.

REPORT ON ALLEGED ELECTION OUTRAGES IN MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate, at a cost not to exceed $500, the majority report, together with the views of the minority, by the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections in regard to certain recent alleged occurrences in Copiah County, Mississippi.

ADMINISTRATION OF CONGRESSIONAL OATHS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions" that order is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. GARLAND. At the suggestion of two or three Senators I ask the Senate to take up the bill I reported from the Judiciary Committee in reference to the administering of oaths by the committees of the Senate and House. It will not take, I am satisfied, exceeding ten or twelve minutes. Several Senators have requested me to call it up and have it acted upon now, inasmuch as it is a House bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has gone into the Secretary's office and will be returned in a moment. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the Senate now consider the bill relating to the administering of oaths in the two Houses, before their committees, reported to-day. Is there objection?

Mr. MAXEY. I hope there will be none. A very important resolution was passed at the instance of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. DAWES] regarding an investigation in the Indian Territory, and that will probably have to be done by a subcommittee. I am very anxious that it should be a thorough investigation, and I think the bill would give full power to a subcommittee's chairman to administer oaths, and it ought to be passed.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4411) to amend section 101 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, so as to allow a chairman of a subcommittee of a committee of either House of Congress to administer oaths, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That any member of either House of Congress may administer oaths to witnesses in any matter depending in either House of Congress of which he is a member, or any committee thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the administration of oaths to witnesses in matters depending in either House of Congress.

OFFICERS AND CREW OF THE DEXTER.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent at this time to propose a question to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce.

There are a good many persons in the State of Massachusetts interested in a resolution of thanks, which has passed the House, to the officers and crew of the revenue steamer Dexter, and other persons, for gallant services at the time of the disaster to the steamer Columbus, and I desire to ask that Senator to state the condition of that resolution in his committee.

Mr. MCMILLAN. In answer to the Senator from Massachusetts I will say that the joint resolution has been before the committee, and has been referred to a subcommittee for consideration. The subcommittee will report to the committee very soon.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator expect a report on it before the close of the present session of Congress?

Mr. MCMILLAN. When the report is received from the subcommittee it will be acted upon, I presume, by the committee at once. I can not state, however, positively what the action of the subcommittee will be.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator is not able to say that the resolution will be reported at the present session I might like to ask some action of the Senate. I understand there are quite a number of precedents of similar resolutions. Perhaps some persons should be included that are not included by the House, especially the Gay Head Indians. I hope the Committee on Commerce will be able to deal with it at this session. The thanks will be deprived of their value, partially at least, if not quickly made.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Represetatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 2677) granting a pension to Miss Mary P. MacBlair; and

A bill (H. R. 6526) making an appropriation for the completion of the sewerage system of the District of Columbia.

RAILROAD IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4680) to grant a right of way through the Indian Territory to the Southern Kansas Railway Company, and for other purposes.

Mr. MITCHELL. When the Senate adjourned Saturday it was understood that the Mexican pension bill was to be taken up this morning.

Mr. PLUMB. At 2 o'clock.

Mr. MITCHELL. There was no hour fixed.

Mr. PLUMB. It was expressly stated, if the Senator will observe the RECORD, that the pension bill should be taken up at 2 o'clock.

Mr. MITCHELL. My understanding was that the bill should be taken up immediately after the morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not open to debate. The Chair on looking at the RECORD does not find that there is anything which authorizes the Chair to lay any matter before the Senate. A discussion was going on upon the subject, the Chair finds, when the Senate adjourned, on a motion made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL] to proceed to the consideration of the postal telegraph bill. The Chair therefore feels bound to put the motion made by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not open to debate. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 32, noes 12.

Mr. HOAR. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the pending motion prevails does that displace the Mexican pension bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not displace anything, as nothing is before the Senate, except the Calendar under Rule VIII, until 2 o'clock. The Secretary will call the roll on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

The roll was called.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM].

Mr. PUGH. I wish to state that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—39.

Allison,	Colquitt,	Ingalls,	Pendleton,
Bayard,	Dolph,	Jackson,	Plumb,
Beck,	Fair,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Bowen,	Farley,	Jones of Florida,	Sawyer,

George,	Mahone,	Sabin,

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4680) to grant a right of way through the Indian Territory to the Southern Kansas Railway Company, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent that the pending bill be read for amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the pending bill have its reading in Committee of the Whole by sections for amendment. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The first section of the bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read section 1.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAWLEY in the chair). Are there amendments to be proposed to the first section?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the votes which were taken on Saturday in the consideration of another bill granting a right of way to a railway through the Indian Territory and the vote which has been taken this morning, showing very decidedly the determination of the Senate to pass these bills, will deter me from spending much time in the discussion of this bill; but I shall feel it to be my duty to offer the same amendments which I moved to the bill under consideration on Saturday.

I think the Senate ought to know that this is in fact an authority for two railroads through the Indian Territory. We passed one on Saturday, and this bill, while but a single railway corporation is named in the title of it and in the body of it, provides for the construction of two entirely independent lines, one running south across the Territory and the other in a southwesterly direction. They do not enter the Territory at the same point; they do not branch within the limits of the Territory, but they are two entirely independent roads. They may be under the control of one company; it may be in the interest of a single syndicate that these roads are to be built; but I think the Senate ought to know that there are two independent roads proposed to be constructed by this bill.

I call the attention of the Senate also to the fact that as to the road that is called a branch road, the one running in a southwesterly direction, the first line described, is "westerly along or near the northern line of said Territory, to a point at or near where Medicine Lodge Creek crosses the northern line of said Territory."

I do not know—perhaps the Senator from Kansas can tell me—what length that line would be from the starting-point, crossing at Medicine Lodge Creek.

Mr. PLUMB. I should say it would be in the neighborhood of fifteen miles.

Mr. HARRISON. I should judge a much longer distance by looking at the map; but the Senator may be right. It will be noticed that there is here a right of way granted along or parallel to the northern line of the Indian Territory for whatever distance it may be, fifteen or twenty miles, when there can be no sort of reason for entering the Territory at all at that point, unless it be that it is found cheaper for the company to get their right of way in the Territory rather than in the State of Kansas. Here is the northern line, and they are allowed by this to run along or near that line just inside the Territory rather than extend the line in the State of Kansas itself to the point where they should leave the State to take a southwesterly direction across the Territory.

Mr. PLUMB. The question of the cost of the right of way would be a very inconsiderable inducement to the railroad company. This is a question, I fancy, from what I know about the country there, more about the practicability of the route than anything else, because the railroad would not build ten or fifteen miles away from its natural point, where by so doing it would go through a country where there was no local traffic. The line through the State of Kansas would give a little more business to the road than it would in the Indian Territory; but there are certain topographical objections there which I think have controlled the determination of the route of the road.

I beg the Senator to observe that the strictures which he made on Saturday on the bill then under consideration in regard to the indefiniteness of the line do not apply here, because this is fixed with such a reasonable degree of certainty as I think will suit almost any one.

Mr. HARRISON. It seems, then, that this railroad company desires to get this strip of land immediately along the line of the Indian Territory. They will then be quite accessible to the State of Kansas, as their right of way may extend to the line, and probably would as it is described here. They would have all the advantages of local traffic in Kansas and at the same time take the right of way from the Indians for the meager compensation that is provided in this bill.

But I did not intend to discuss the bill generally. That probably would be a waste of time. The bill we have before us has never been before a committee of the Senate. It may be or may not be—I have not had time to compare it—identical in language with a bill reported by the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs; but certain it is that we are proceeding now to the consideration of a bill that has never had the consideration of any Senate committee.

I move, in line 24, to strike out the word "extension." It is singular how inapt the framers of these bills are in using terms. I had occasion on Saturday to call attention to the fact that in the bill we were then considering the word "branches" was put in, and yet it was said that it had reference simply to tracks to be built on the right of way; and yet I take it no man in railroad nomenclature ever called a track built upon a company's right of way a branch track.

Mr. PLUMB. So far as I have power to give any consent to the amendment, I am entirely willing the section shall be amended as the Senator has suggested. Further than that, I may say now, once for all, that I am entirely willing, and I believe every one else is who is a friend of this bill, that it shall be amended as the bill that passed the Senate on Saturday was amended. I will go further, and say that any other amendment which does not essentially cripple the railroad company in the building of this railroad will be entirely acceptable to me at least.

Mr. HARRISON. I am much obliged to the Senator from Kansas that he is willing to accept any amendment that does not cripple the railroad company. I think there is another interest to be considered here, and that is the interest of the Indians, and another still not to be overlooked, namely, our treaty relations to these tribes.

I want to say that it has never been a practice of this Government to allow a railroad company to cross an Indian reservation, even where it was established only by an executive order, without requiring the company to negotiate with the tribe. I recollect well a few years ago when I was in Montana that the agents of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company were holding a council with the Crows to agree upon the terms on which they might cross the Crow reservation, that negotiation being under the supervision of the Indian Bureau. But here we are passing bills one after another, one Saturday for one railroad, two railroads embodied in this to-day, without ever going to these civilized tribes at all and asking their consent, without entering into any negotiation with them as to the terms on which these grants should be given.

Mr. VEST. Does not the Senator from Indiana know—if he does not know I will inform him now of the fact—that the right of way through the Crow reservation and the Flathead reservation was condemned and commissioners appointed without consulting the Indians in regard to it?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know what the ultimate course taken may have been, but I do know that there was a council called, and that the agents of that railroad entered upon negotiation with them on the subject.

Mr. VEST. The facts are that the commissioners were appointed and the right of way condemned; there was no commissioner appointed at the instance of the Indians at all; and I called the attention of Congress to it by offering a resolution to pay the money which was assessed for the right of way through the Flathead reservation at this session of the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. That may be true.

Mr. DAWES. I think the Senator from Missouri is mistaken. Since I have had something to do with the Committee on Indian Affairs every railroad that has crossed an Indian reservation has been in pursuance of an agreement entered into in the Interior Department with the Indians themselves at a fixed price, ratified here by a bill reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs in ratification of the agreement. I do not know of a single exception.

Mr. VEST. I still assert the fact, and the record will show that the right of way was condemned through the Flathead reservation by commissioners, and afterward we passed a bill here, and the Senator knows that I offered a resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, who sent it to the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. DAWES. The pay came to the Flathead Indians in the way the Senator indicates.

Mr. VEST. But the point I indicated was that the right of way was condemned by commissioners.

Mr. DAWES. Not since I have had anything to do with the Committee on Indian Affairs has there been a railroad authorized to cross an Indian reservation in any other way, except in the Indian Territory, and that was done through the Railroad Committee without the advice of or without any recommendation from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course the Committee on Indian Affairs have nothing to do with condemning the right of way. All they have to do is to consider the payment after the condemnation is made. But I say there was no agreement between the Indians and the railroad company as to the price of that land.

Mr. DAWES. I think the Senator is mistaken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator undoubtedly intends to communicate it as he understands it; but the record, I am quite sure, will bear out the statement which I make in reference to every Indian reservation; and the first time within my knowledge in either House of Congress that an attempt was made to put a railroad across an Indian reservation without the consent of the Indians was at the last session of Congress when the idea was for the first time broached that, in spite of our agreement not to, we would assert our power.

Mr. SEWELL. I simply want to reply to the Senator from Massachusetts. The bill reported at the last Congress from the Railroad Committee granting a charter for a railroad company in the Indian Territory provided not for so much per acre or per mile for the right of way two hundred feet, but provided that the railroad company should get the consent of the legislatures of the two nations and the headmen of the tribes before they went through.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator is right that in the case of the Saint Louis and San Francisco road that was expressly provided, and I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that all the safeguards which were thrown around that charter are utterly disregarded in the charters which we are now passing.

Mr. President, can anything more arbitrary be thought of than that the Congress of the United States should undertake to say how much per mile this railroad company shall pay for the occupancy of these lands in the Indian Territory? The Senator from Missouri says that in the other case commissioners were appointed and the damages or the compensation to be paid for the right of way was assessed. How is it here? It is stipulated in this bill, without any negotiation with these tribes at all, that the compensation is to be $50 per mile for the right of way through these Indian lands and $15 a mile to be paid annually thereafter for the benefit of the tribes; and then we have the stipulation that if within four or five months after that time the councils of these tribes shall dissent then some machinery shall be put in force by which we shall have an assessment of the right of way. I say that it is arbitrary and inexorable and unreasonable.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator from Indiana permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. COKE. I ask the Senator from Indiana if when lands are condemned in Indiana and in any other State in the Union, exactly the sort of process is not resorted to that is prescribed in this bill, except that there is no offer made of a certain amount in the first instance as is made in this bill to the Indians?

Mr. HARRISON. By no manner of means, Mr. President; and the Senator from Texas is too good a lawyer not to know that there is no relation between the case he suggests and this case. We are dealing here with a people upon whom we have conferred local sovereignty over this question. We have given them political rights there as well as rights in the land as owner.

Mr. COKE. I undertake to say that in no State of the Union are the white people dealt with half so liberally when their lands are sought to be condemned for railroads as the Indians are in this bill. This bill simply says to the Indians: "Here is a certain amount that you can take if you think it is sufficient; if you believe it is not sufficient, the courts are open to you where you can by judicial proceedings have the full value of your land determined." There is nothing in any State law which says more to any white men in any State of the Union than this.

Mr. HARRISON. I yielded to the Senator for a question. He has asked it. The Senator thinks the provisions here are humane toward these Indians, and he speaks of the jurisdiction which is given to the courts to which they may go and have these matters settled. Why, Mr. President, the claims that these individual occupants of land may have either for damages done to their lands or to their buildings or improvements by the crossing of this railroad company they had better a hundred times concede or donate to the railroad company than to seek the remedies that are provided in the bill.

Does the Senator know of any State in the Union where a farmer whose little tract of land is crossed by a railroad company is required to go one to two hundred miles into another jurisdiction to assert his claim? The forums there are local, they are accessive, they are inexpensive, and I undertake to say that in nine cases out of ten the Indian whose home or property is damaged by this road in crossing had better give it to the railroad company than to seek his remedy in the courts.

Mr. COKE. The Indian goes to the Indian court just as the white man goes to my friend's court.

Mr. HARRISON. But you take him away from his own court that you have expressly given him by treaty, where this question should be settled; and I call attention again to the fact that whereas the Senate has required the assent of tribes in advance of the building of the roads, as the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] has said, we are going on so far here now that we do not ask their consent, and I find in the bill a stipulation that the general council of either of these nations may within four months after the filing of a map and definite location dissent from the allowances provided in this section. No previous consent is asked. I say that no lawyer will take these two bills, the one the San Francisco and Saint Louis bill, which the Senate passed at the last Congress, and lay it alongside of this, who will not see that almost every valuable right which was reserved to the Indians there has been taken away by this bill, leaving the way open to dealing with that whole question, irrespective of the rights of the Indians.

However, the votes which have been taken on this question discourage much discussion. My motion is to strike out the word "extensions," in line 24, of section 1.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest to the Senator that he ought to strike out also the word "and," which precedes it, and insert the word "and" before the word "sidings," in line 23.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWN. How would it then read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 23, before the word "sidings," it is moved to insert the word "and," and after the word "sidings" to strike out "and extensions;" so as to read:

With the right to construct, use, and maintain such tracks, turnouts, and sidings as said company may deem it to their interest to construct along and upon the right of way and depot grounds hereby granted.

Mr. CONGER. I agree, Mr. President, with all the Senator from Indiana has said in regard to this bill and the encroachments upon the rights of the Indians in the Indian Territory in this and, as I have opposed them, in other bills.

The Committee on Commerce, of which I was a member, necessarily sat on Saturday at the time the former of the two bills in question was passed. I had intended then, as I propose to do now, to present to the Senate and have spread upon the RECORD the protest of the delegation of the Cherokee Nation in attendance near this seat of government to watch over and have care of the rights of these Indians in the Indian Territory.

I do not know that I have ever read a protest from the representatives of any people that set forth in so plain a manner the wrongs and the encroachments of a great government upon a poor people as is contained in this circular addressed to myself and to other Senators here, and which the members of the Cherokee delegation, Mr. Bell and Mr. Schrimsher, desired to have presented to the Senate and to the American people. I ask that it be read and go into the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The paper sent up by the Senator from Michigan will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 16, 1884.

SIR: Two bills granting the right of way to private corporations each for a railroad through our county were passed the House of Representatives on May 30, and are now before the Senate; they are an act to grant to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, H. R. 3961, and H. R. 4680, granting a similar right to the Southern Kansas Railway Company. These bills have been referred to no Senate committee, and if passed will revolutionize the Indian Territory under the pretext of granting a right of way.

Mr. CONGER. Let me interfere here. I desire to make that protest part of my remarks. I do not know whether that assertion that these House bills have been referred to no committee of the Senate is true or not, but I had looked and inquired if there was any report from any committee in favor of these bills before the Senate, and I am informed that there is no report.

Mr. INGALLS. It is perhaps just that the Senator from Michigan should be advised that bills identical with these which passed the House were reported from committees of the Senate and are now on the Calendar.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator allow me to correct him? That is true as to one single bill that went to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and was reported by the Senator. The bill that went to our Committee on Railroads (S. 50) in relation to the Gulf Railroad Company was a totally different bill from the House bill, though I am bound to say that the House bill was much more friendly to the Indians than the Senate bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Then substantially my statement is correct that both subjects had been under consideration by the committees of this body and reports had been made, so that the Senator from Michigan is technically correct, but at the same time the matters have received attention from Senate committees.

Mr. CONGER. Oh! they have been considered by the Committee on Territories, although the bills were not referred to the Committee on Territories. But these bills and the subject-matter of the encroachment upon Indian rights were considered by the Committee on Territories. I am free to say it was not believed it was possible that such a bill as one of these is, as this bill before the Senate is, could be reported favorably without great alterations and amendments. Now, on these bills there is no report whatever, none on this special bill or its provisions, and these representatives of the Cherokee Nation come before the American people in their protest and say that the Senate is passing a bill here without having the report of a committee upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to have the reading completed?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir; but as that was part of my remarks, I thought I would interpolate now and then to emphasize what the delegation say.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the paper as follows:

Besides the main lines this bill gives them the right to construct branches without limit in our country. They in the first place proceed to take our property without in any way consulting us, and are full of new, dangerous, and injurious propositions, never before heard of in any railroad charter in any State or Territory, and which would not be tolerated there. Such a proposition as that a railroad company could settle its employés on the right of way, thus to acquire vested rights, even if employed for a month, may well indeed be called bills to open the Indian Territory to settlement.

Section 7 of both bills opens to settlement all along the line the lands granted by it in the second section. Besides the right of way, stations may be created in the discretion of the company when an additional grant of 200 feet wide and 3,000 feet long is given them—enough to build a village on every seven miles. They may also take additional amounts wherever they want for "cuts and fills," and on all of these settlements may be made. Provision is thus made for straggling towns and settlements all along the line. Permits are not to be required of such settlers. Any one can be introduced by the company under the plea that they are employés, and obtain vested rights in improvements thereon from which it would be difficult or impossible to remove or dispossess them. What railway company in the United States is permitted to allow its laborers or employés to settle on and build houses and make gardens and acquire individual rights on the right of way? In the Indian Territory it would be an open door to create drinking saloons and trading establishments all along the line. To show that it was designed for this purpose, and entirely unnecessary for the operation of the road, we refer to the clause under which two roads have been successfully operated for more than two years. That ought to be followed. We granted the right of way to two railroad companies in the treaty of 1866, the eleventh section containing (volume 14, pages 801 and 802, Stats.):

"Said company or corporation, and their employés and laborers, while constructing and repairing the same, and in operating said road or roads, including all necessary agents on the line, at stations, switches, water-tanks, and all others necessary to the successful operation of a railroad, shall be protected in the discharge of their duties, and at all times subject to the Indian intercourse laws, now or which may hereafter be enacted and be in force in the Cherokee Nation."

We would further call attention to the totally inadequate compensation for this valuable franchise, which interferes with the cultivation and successful grazing and other interests of our people. For one hundred miles of such a franchise they propose in this bill to pay us $5,000. No one could pretend that this was the value of such a franchise. For the Choctaw right of way $2,000 a year was paid. The price at which it is thus arbitrarily proposed to dispose of our property is not one-tenth of what it is worth. The United States sold us and patented to us our property for a full consideration, and it thus proposes to take it without consulting us. In your treaties you guaranteed to us that our legislature and courts should have exclusive jurisdiction of all questions touching the persons and property of our people. In those bills you propose to violate our treaties and insert a provision for compensation that is altogether unfair, and thus take our property for the benefit of a private corporation without judicial determination.

The provisions of these bills for paying damages to individuals through whose farms and houses it may run are altogether unjust and inadequate. Instead of allowing the individual affected to select one appraiser and the company another, and they, if necessary, to select a third, the commission thus created is packed to begin with, by allowing the third man to be selected by the Indian Bureau. We know by experience what that amounts to. In the former case the United States agent and the railroad agent fixed the damages. The United States agent traveled free on the road, and was otherwise under the influence of the railroad company the moment he was designated. In one case the commission allowed $15 damages to a settler for going through his fenced and cultivated farm diagonally for nearly a mile, and the owner never even condescended to take this flagrant assessment of damages.

The bill further provides for an appeal to courts which have by their oganization no civil jurisdiction in our country, and even if they had, the machinery is far too expensive and cumbrous, and the distance to be traveled too great to be of any avail. In every case the expense to the claimant would be more than he could possibly recover. In the larger interest of the nation no appeal is given to the Supreme Court, and we are left to the jurisdiction of hostile courts. The civil jurisdiction is now vested in our courts. They have their regular sessions. We venture to say that their proceedings are as honorable and fair as those of any court in any State or Territory. The Atlantic and Pacific Railway, by volutary agreement, agreed to refer every case involving civil jurisdiction to the local courts. This was done two years ago, and they have never desired to change it. Why seek now to violate our treaties and overthrow the jurisdiction of our courts?

There is another provision to which we would call your attention. To escape taxation, to which they would be subject in any State, it is adroitly provided that Congress may tax these railroads. You are well aware that Congress is not in the habit of laying taxes on property in States and Territories. It would be a new and unprecedented if not unconstitutional thing. It is intended to prohibit any local taxations and will be the basis of a claim by the company that they can never be locally taxed or taxed at all.

Some half dozen companies are now clamoring for rights of way through our country, more roads than are at present needed. They wish to get valuable franchises from our property to sell. They will file maps for roads and branches all over our country and forbid our people from using all these portions of our property on pain of confiscation. If any further roads are needed we would suggest that authority be given to the Secretary of the Interior to enter into negotiations for such right of way and necessary privileges with the authorities of the nation to whom the property belongs. In this way all roads that really need to be built can be constructed on terms fair and honorable to all parties. Until this has been tried we respectfully protest against these dangerous innovations and wholesale confiscations of our rights, and we appeal to the American Congress not thus unjustly to violate its treaties with us.

We are, very respectfully,

L. B. BELL,
J. G. SCHRIMSHER,
Cherokee Delegation.

Hon. OMAR D. CONGER, United States Senate.

Mr. CONGER. Whether that has been listened to by Senators or not, or whether they have read it otherwise, I desire that that protest, carefully drawn, respectfully worded, made by the Cherokee delegation near this seat of government, allowed to be here as agents for that government, watching the interests of their people, shall be heard, and I desire that it shall go into the RECORD that the people of the United States may see that our treatment of the Indians in the Indian Territory at the command of these railroad corporations is infamously worse than any private citizens in any other part of the United States are treated by any corporations that are permitted to exist.

Sir, there is a picture of violated treaties, of assumption of power, of direct wrong to the Indians as a whole, and a direct refusal of rights to the Indians in particular, such as I think can never be found in any other law or any other provisions of law that Congress in these days has ever passed.

I am free to say that when I read that humble petition and appeal to the Congress of the United States from the representatives of a nation which has emerged from its savage state to a high condition of civilization, from a people to whom we pledged a separate Territory and a separate government and separate courts, and the defense of their rights in their own way, I felt an indignation which I do not desire to express here to-day.

Now, sir, this bill should go to a committee, that the first principles of justice and of right, that the prime obligations of our treaties with these Indian tribes may be enacted in the bill, that rights may be protected by it, and that great wrongs may be avoided.

Sir, what is the use of having a separate Indian Territory for these nations that are becoming civilized and Christianized if, as they say, you may scatter along the whole line of interior communication the grog-shop and the theater, if you may plant right in their midst the worst seeds of evil and of crime and they have no voice in regard to it, for, as these delegates say, under the provisions of this act the company may build all along the line through the Indian Territory under the pretense of building houses and accommodations for the employés of the road, and they may scatter all through not only the residences of the employés, but the dram-shops to corrupt both employés and Indians.

I do not know that the Senate will adopt such amendments as ought to be made to make this bill conform to other bills such as are passed, even to go through the States and the Territories where there is the protection of general laws; but if not I hope before it is disposed of it will be committed to the committee, that they may incorporate into it some of the plain practical principles of justice and of right and of protection, not only to the property of the Indians but to their morals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any other amendment to the first section? If not, the second section will be read.

The Chief Clerk read section 2.

Mr. DAWES. I offer to this bill the same amendment that was adopted on my motion to the other bill, to strike out lines 14, 15, and 16 of section 2, and insert what I send to the desk, from the RECORD of yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, beginning at line 14, it is proposed to strike out:

That no part of the lands intended to be occupied for right of way or depot purposes shall be used except in such manner as may be necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said railroad, telegraph, and telephone.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That no part of the lands herein granted shall be used except in such manner and for such purposes only as shall be necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said railroad, telegraph, and telephone lines; and when any portion thereof shall cease to be so used, such portion shall revert to the nation or tribe of Indians from which the same shall have been taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any further amendment to the second section? If not, the third section will be read.

The Chief Clerk read section 3.

Mr. DAWES. In line 26 of section 3 I move to strike out the words:

One to be named by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, one by the principal chief of the nation or tribe in which the land to be appropriated is situated, and one by said company.

And insert in place thereof:

To be appointed by the President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. That involves the necessity of another amendment in the fifth section, but perhaps I had better wait until that is reached.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment to section 3, the fourth section will be read.

The Chief Clerk read section 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there amendments to this section? If not, the fifth section will be read.

The Chief Clerk read section 5.

Mr. DAWES. In line 32 of section 5, after the word "lands," I move to strike out:

Except that one of said referees shall be appointed by the council of the dissenting nation or tribe, instead of by its principal chief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I move to strike out the word "four," in line 25, and insert "twelve."

The section gives the council of the dissenting tribe four months after the filing of the maps of definite location. I do not know what their laws may be, or how often their councils assemble; but as we are undertaking to fix their compensation here without consulting them, it seems to me that twelve months is not an unreasonable time to allow them to act on the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there other amendments to section 5? If none, section 6 will be read.

The Chief Clerk read section 6.

Mr. HARRISON. In line 2 of that section I move to strike out the word "general." It seems to be indicated by this that a map of location shall be filed, and that when filed it shall exclude the right of any person to settle upon that land. If that is to operate with any fairness at all, this location ought not to be the general route; it ought to be the specific and located route described in such a way that persons who might desire to settle on the land should be able to know by examining the profile whether they were within or without the right of way of this railway.

Mr. PLUMB. There is no objection to that amendment. It is very proper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. At the end of the same section I move to insert the words:

And said location shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior before work is begun.

Mr. PLUMB. That is all right. It is a similar amendment to one adopted on Saturday.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know whether it comes in in the same relation to other matters in the bill, but I think it will do to put it in there.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any further amendment to section 6? If not, section 7 will be read.

Mr. CONGER. I move, in line 12 of section 6, after the word "thereafter," to insert:

And shall complete said railroad within two years thereafter.

Mr. PLUMB. I call attention to the fact that in section 9 there is a limitation on the time of construction.

Mr. CONGER. This refers to grading the line. It does not take more than one man and a shovel to commence grading.

Shall commence grading said located line within six months thereafter.

There should be a limit to the time when it shall be completed.

Mr. PLUMB. All right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Michigan will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 6, line 12, after the word "thereafter," it is proposed to insert:

And shall complete said railroad within two years thereafter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any further amendment to section 6?

Mr. CONGER. I move to strike out the last part of section 6. It reads:

Or such location shall be void as to any occupant thereof.

I move to strike out the words "as to any occupant thereof," in lines 12 and 13, so as to read:

"Shall commence grading said located line within six months thereafter, and shall complete said railroad within two years thereafter, or such location shall be void."

It ought to be void as to the tribe and everybody if it be void at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any further amendment to section 6?

Mr. CONGER. I have an amendment to the section, which I have not prepared now. I will prepare it hereafter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Section 7 will be read.

The Chief Clerk read section 7.

Mr. HARRISON. That is very clearly and palpably in violation of the treaties with these tribes, as I undertook to show the Senate on Saturday by reading from the treaties. I move to insert this from the tenth section of the Saint Louis and San Francisco charter, striking out section 7 and inserting this in lieu of it:

The officers, servants, and employés of said company necessary to the construction and management of said road shall be allowed to reside, while so engaged, upon such right of way, but subject to the provisions of the Indian intercourse laws and such rules and regulations as may be established by the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. If I may be allowed now to go back to section 6, instead of taking it up at some other time, I will offer my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the amendment of the Senator from Michigan to section 6 will be received.

Mr. CONGER. I move to strike out, in line 6, after the word "located," down to and including the word "company" at the end of line 8.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan moves an amendment to strike out of section 6 the words which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the words proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

And after the filing of said maps no claim for a subsequent settlement and improvement upon the right of way shown by said maps shall be valid as against said company.

Mr. CONGER. We have made provision that if the located line is not graded within a certain time and is not finished within two years the whole grant shall be void, but this provides that no Indian shall make any claim after the line is located.

Mr. PLUMB. I will say to the Senator from Michigan that there is no objection to the amendment at all. I have no doubt it will be adopted.

Mr. CONGER. These things that are so palpably wrong that the mere suggestion of them is sufficient to have them stricken out may affect very many rights. I think they call for a very critical examination of this bill and a little allusion to it once in a while. I will not make any further remarks on this amendment. My remarks are offensive somewhat, I think, to those who prepared the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HARRISON. If the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, I rise to move to proceed to the consideration of the pension bill; but I will not make the motion until this question is taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order. My amendment can come up at the proper time.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to continue the consideration of the bill under consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is business under Rule IX.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the regular order be laid aside and that the Senate proceed with House bill 4680.

Mr. CONGER. The regular order must be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that there is no regular order other than to proceed under Rule IX.

Mr. HARRISON. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the occupant of the chair on Saturday said, as the Chair will find by referring to the RECORD, that under the unanimous consent given to proceed to the consideration of the Mexican pension bill he would deem it his duty to lay that bill before the Senate at 2 o'clock to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was not aware of that.

Mr. HARRISON. The statement in the RECORD is as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By what the Chair understood to be the unanimous consent of the Senate before proceeding to the consideration of the bills which have been considered, it was agreed that the Mexican pension bill should be proceeded with on Monday, in view of which fact the Chair regards it as his duty to lay that bill before the Senate before the adjournment to-day.

So that I think it is the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. PLUMB. Now I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be laid aside informally——

Mr. CONGER. Let it be laid before the Senate.

Mr. PLUMB. Until House bill 4680 may be disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not distinctly hear the motion.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be laid aside informally in order that the Senate continue the consideration of House bill 4680.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Treating the Mexican pension bill as the unfinished business——

Mr. PLUMB. I understood the Chair decided that it was the unfinished business, and laid it before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understood.

Mr. CONGER. It has not been laid before the Senate yet. Let it be laid before the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Senator from Kansas whether he had not better let this lie over until to-morrow morning?

Mr. PLUMB. If I had any encouragement to believe the bill would be taken up at any other time and considered with a disposition to accept the judgement of the Senate, I would not care; but if it goes over until to-morrow, I am sure it will occupy a great deal more time than if it is acted on now.

Mr. HARRISON. There are many of us who have no disposition to prevent the Senator from Kansas getting a vote on this bill but who still would be unwilling to vote to take up this railroad bill and postpone the Mexican pension bill.

Mr. PLUMB. We could pass it in less time than we are talking about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that as a matter of fact the presiding officer of the Senate at the adjournment on Saturday did not lay the Mexican pension bill before the Senate as the unfinished business.

Mr. CONGER. But said it would come up at 2 o'clock to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL. The presiding officer so stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He said he would lay it before the Senate, but the Chair is informed that he did not do so.

Mr. CONGER. But it was the agreement that at 2 o'clock to-day the Mexican pension bill should be the order of business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For the purposes of the Senator from Kansas it is quite immaterial whether the regular order be the Mexican pension bill or the Calendar under Rule IX. The Senator from Kansas moves to lay aside the pending business and proceed with the consideration of House bill 4680.

Mr. CONGER. The difference as I understand it is that in one case it requires a two-thirds vote to lay aside the regular order, and I think that is a very important consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that a majority controls in this case. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas to lay aside the pending business and proceed with the consideration of House bill 4680.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend that by striking out——

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It is not amendable.

Mr. CONGER. By inserting in place of this bill the Mexican pension bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I rise to a question of order that the motion made by the Senator from Michigan is not in order. This motion of the Senator from Kansas is not an amendable motion.

Mr. FRYE. Nor debatable?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Nor debatable either.

Mr. CONGER. That is before 2 o'clock. We are laboring now under the rule after 2 o'clock.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It does not make a particle of difference whether the motion was made before or after 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the Senator from Wisconsin is correct in the point of order. The motion is not amendable or debatable.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I desire to ask the Chair what the pending business is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, so far as the present occupant is informed, thinks the regular order of business at 2 o'clock is proceeding with the Calendar under the ninth rule. Something was said on Saturday about treating the Mexican pension bill as unfinished business, but at the close of the session on Saturday the Chair did not lay it before the Senate as unfinished business, and the time of the Senate at that moment was occupied in a motion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL] concerning the postal telegraph bill, and the Senate adjourned with that motion pending.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Chair is mistaken in that. It was by unanimous consent. I read from the RECORD:

> The PRESIDING OFFICER. By what the Chair understood to be the unanimous consent of the Senate before proceeding to the consideration of the bills which have been considered, it was agreed that the Mexican pension bill should be proceeded with on Monday, in view of which fact the Chair regards it as his duty to lay that bill before the Senate before the adjournment to-day.

Later on the Chair said:

> The Chair will state that under an order of the Senate, if the Senate makes no order in conflict with that view of it, the Chair will lay before the Senate the Mexican pension bill before adjournment to-day, so as to leave it the unfinished business.

I understand in fact that it was not so laid before the Senate, but it was by unanimous consent made the special order for this time and so stated by the Chair. It appears to me that it is now in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. Here is the understanding stated by the presiding officer. I myself suggested that we had better let the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] proceed with the Army appropriation bill, and after some colloquy, in which that understanding seemed to be arrived at, the presiding officer said:

> Is there objection to the suggestion made by the Senators from Ohio and Illinois, that the pension bill shall go over to-day with the understanding that it is to be proceeded with on Monday; that the unfinished business continue to be informally laid aside; and that the appropriation bill be now taken up? Is there objection? ["None!"] The Chair hears none.

Thereupon the Army bill was proceeded with, but it was with the distinct understanding that the pension bill was to come up at 2 o'clock to-day.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. But in point of fact it was not laid before the Senate before the adjournment.

Mr. SHERMAN. That does not affect it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Consequently no matter what the understanding was it lost its position as the special order.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have always regarded the unanimous consent of the Senate as the law of the Medes and Persians, never to be changed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair did not hear of these proceedings on Saturday, and, therefore, is dependent on the suggestions of Senators. If it was the unanimous agreement of the Senate on Saturday that at 2 o'clock on Monday the Mexican pension bill should be laid before the Senate as unfinished business, the Chair thinks that agreement must be carried out.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I chance to have occupied the chair at the time that these proceedings were had. The question was distinctly put upon the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to lay aside the Mexican pension bill informally with the distinct understanding that at 2 o'clock on Monday it was to be taken up and proceeded with. The Chair announced that there was no objection, and that the Senate had unanimously consented to take the bill up at this time.

Late on Saturday evening there was a motion on the part of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL] to proceed to the consideration of another bill, he announcing the object to make it the unfinished business. The Chair then announced that if by vote of the Senate that bill was taken up and not disposed of it would be the unfinished business, but, unless it was, the Chair understood by the unanimous consent of the Senate at 2 o'clock to-day the Mexican pension bill was to be taken up and proceeded with. I was occupying the chair at the adjournment, and thoughtlessly neglected to lay the Mexican pension bill, as I should have done, before the Senate; and having thoughtlessly failed to do so, the Senator from Wisconsin is right, technically; it is not the unfinished business; but according to the unanimous agreement of the Senate it ought to be proceeded with, and the Senate will have to violate what was a unanimous agreement on Saturday if it does not proceed with the Mexican pension bill at this hour to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests that the Mexican pension bill be laid before the Senate, and then the Senator from Kansas can move to lay it aside for the present and proceed with House bill 4680. Is there objection to that course of proceeding? The Chair hears none, and lays before the Senate as the unfinished business the bill (H. R. 5667) granting pensions to soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLUMB. I move now that that be laid aside.

Mr. HARRIS. Unanimous consent is the only consent by which it can be laid aside.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent that it be informally laid aside, and that the Senate proceed with the consideration of House bill 4680.

Mr. CONGER. I object to that.

Mr. PLUMB. Then I move to postpone the consideration of the unfinished business until 4 o'clock to-day, in order that the Senate may proceed with the consideration of House bill 4680.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Kansas can not obtain unanimous consent, I shall not object to his proceeding with the bill, but I hope we shall not consume time in taking votes, and I should be bound, however willing I am to see the Senator's bill taken up and proceeded with to a conclusion, to vote against the motion to postpone.

Mr. HOAR. I do not know that there is any such motion known to our rules.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the Senator take his chances to get the bill up to-morrow and I will very cheerfully assist him to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to raise the point that there is no such motion as to postpone a bill to a particular hour on the same day. That is an indefinite postponement.

Mr. PLUMB. I will then vary the request I have to make of the Senate, which is that by unanimous consent the bill which is now almost finished may be taken up immediately after the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand the motion.

Mr. PLUMB. I was about to ask unanimous consent that the bill which has been under consideration during the morning hour, House bill 4680, may be taken up to-morrow morning at the close of morning business.

Mr. SHERMAN. You can move it yourself then.

Mr. PLUMB. I know I can, but I ask for an understanding now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 4680) to grant a right of way through the Indian Territory to the Southern Kansas Railway Company, and for other purposes, shall be taken up immediately after the morning business to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. CONGER. The Senate on two or three occasions have by unanimous consent decided to take up during the morning hour, before 2 o'clock, the pension bills on our Calendar, and it was considering them when the railroad bills and bills of that class intervened and took away the consideration of pension bills to our soldiers. I have endeavored from day to day to bring up those pension bills, and as soon as there has been an opportunity to commence them, with one unfinished standing in the way of the others, these railroad bills drove away the pension bills in the only time they can be considered, the morning hour. For that reason I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan objects to the proposition of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. I give notice that to-morrow morning at the conclusion of the morning business, or, if it is not through by 1 o'clock, at 1 o'clock, I shall move to take up the bill which has been under consideration this morning with a view to concluding it; and I now wish to say to the Senator who has charge of the Mexican pension bill, if any Senator has charge of it, that if its consideration is not concluded before to-morrow at 2 o'clock, I shall feel constrained under my obligation of duty to move to antagonize it with one or more of the bills reported from the Committee on Public Lands for the forfeiture of unearned land grants, and I do that for this purpose: If the Senate adjourns within a reasonable length of time, it must settle these bills some time and I shall have to discharge what I believe to be my duty at all events by calling the attention of the Senate to the matter, and to-morrow I shall move to take up the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad forfeiture bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6861) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 2228) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAWLEY in the chair) laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, giving notice of the forwarding of a box of publications of the Spanish senate to the United States Senate, and inclosing a copy of a letter from the Spanish minister stating that an interchange of such documents is hereafter desired by his government; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers submitting a report from Major Amos Stickney, of the Corps of Engineers, upon the Natalbany River, Louisiana, with a view to its improvement, made to comply with the requirements of the river and harbor act of August 2, 1882; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, recommending certain additions to the appropriation for deficiencies for the current and previous years; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, recommending that the act of July 15, 1882, be amended so as to require the petition of the claimant for land taken for the improvement of the water supply of the city of Washington to be filed within one year and six months from the publication of notice; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, recommending certain amendments to House bill No. 7235, making appropriations to supply deficiencies for 1884 and prior years; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting recommendation of the Light-House Board for the removal of Croatan light from its present location to Eight-Foot Knoll, North Carolina.

Mr. CONGER. The communication just read asks merely for an appropriation. The Light-House Board has made the recommendation. Sending it to the Committee on Commerce would only be to have it reported back with approval or disapproval of the recommendation of the Light-House Board and would not further the object of the communication. I suggest that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the communication will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

WARING UNDERGROUND SYSTEM.

Mr. FRYE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate all information in his possession relating to the underground system, known as the Waring system, of telegraph and telephone conductors connecting the Capitol and the several Executive Departments.

JOSEPH MONTGOMERY.

Mr. FRYE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate to Joseph Montgomery the sum of $89.95, the amount due him for service as laborer in the Senate from July 17 to August 31, 1879.

AMENDMENTS TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. PENDLETON, Mr. CALL, Mr. BROWN, and Mr. JONES of Florida submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER, Mr. LAMAR, and Mr. MILLER of California submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. BAYARD and Mr. BLAIR submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee an Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will take the opportunity to lay before the Senate the bill (H. R. 6861) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, with the action of the House of Representatives thereon.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June 23, 1884.

Resolved, That the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6861) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate insists on its amendment to the bill, and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. LOGAN, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. RANSOM were appointed.

MEXICAN WAR PENSIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5667) granting pensions to soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], on which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. The proposed amendment is to add as an additional section the following:

SEC. 3. That section 2 of the act of March 3, 1879, chapter 187, entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of the arrears of pensions granted by act of Congress approved January 25, 1879, and for other purposes," be, and the same hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That all pensions which have been or which may hereafter be granted in consequence of death occurring from a cause which originated in the service since the 4th day of March, 1861, or in consequence of wounds or injuries received or disease contracted since that date in the service and in the line of duty, shall commence from the death or discharge of the person on whose account the claim has been or is hereafter granted, if the disability occurred prior to discharge, and if such disability occurred after the discharge, then from the date of actual disability, or from the termination of the right of the party having prior title to such pension: Provided, That the application for such pension has been or is hereafter filed with the Commissioner of Pensions prior to the 1st day of October, 1884, otherwise the pensions shall commence from the date of filing the application; but the limitation herein prescribed shall not apply to claims by or in behalf of insane persons and children under 16 years of age: Provided further, That hereafter in the adjudication of claims involving arrears, in determining the amount of arrears due prior to the filing of the application, no distinction of rank shall be made and officers of all grades of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, their widows, children, and dependent relatives, shall be rated as to such arrears as enlisted men, their widows, children, and dependent relatives are now rated under existing laws."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I regret very much to oppose any proposition that is favored by the Union soldiers of the American Army; and I perhaps should feel some hesitation in doing it only that I know very well that the soldiers themselves, like all other citizens, are divided in opinion as to this measure.

This proposition repeals all restriction as to time upon applications to be made for arrears of pensions and extends all pensions back to the war or date of discharge or disability not only of those who have heretofore applied, but of those who may hereafter apply. It removes absolutely all restrictions upon the applications for arrears of pensions. And if this only involved ten or even twenty million dollars, I might still hesitate, because I have always since the close of the war voted for every measure that has been offered in good faith for the benefit of the Union soldiers. My heart, my feelings, are all with them. I appreciate the value of their services, the enormous benefits they have conferred upon the people of America for generations yet unborn, and I hesitate therefore to oppose any wish that they may express through their organs.

But this proposition now affects the interest of all the people of the United States, not only soldiers, but citizens, those who have been born and become citizens since the right to a pension accrued; and therefore I am bound to consider the common good of all the people of the United States as against the claims or demands of a portion of our soldiers, however meritorious they may be.

This measure involves an immense sum of money. That alone would not be conclusive. But here is a motion made by a Senator, without the report or sanction of any committee of this body, to put upon the people of the United States a great demand, ranging anywhere from $10,000,000 up to $246,000,000, a proposition so indefinite in character that the Commissioner of Pensions is utterly unable to give us any approximate estimate, but gives his guess as near as he can. He says that this proposition will involve the expenditure of $246,000,000. I believe that he has overestimated the amount that will be demanded, and I feel bound to say so. When the arrears-of-pension bill of 1879 was passed it was greatly underestimated in the Senate and by the Commissioner of Pensions. Now I think this is an overestimate. Still this claim for arrears of pension involves an enormous sum. There have been 138,000 pension claims filed since the limitation of July 1, 1880, for arrears of pension, and each of these 138,000 claimants can claim under this proposition arrears of pension from the date of the war or from the date of their discharge; and besides all persons filing their claims hereafter and prior to the 1st of October, 1884, can also file claims for arrears of pension.

But that is not all. We know just as well as we know the sun rolls around in its course that if we now remove the restriction imposed by the act of 1879, in the next Congress the restriction which we now endeavor to put upon the law will be removed, and it seems to me that it would be just that it should be removed. If Congress years ago, after a restriction had been in existence for several years, removed that restriction, as a matter of course we shall be called upon to remove our restriction; and if you once now again establish the precedent that there shall be no limitation at all to arrears of pension, then the limitation you now put upon this law will be mere waster paper; it will not prevent the filing of future applications or the future removal of this limitation.

Now, Mr. President, it must be remembered that this proposition comes to us not with the sanction of any committee. The Committee on Pensions of this body has not dared to take the responsibility of proposing this removal of that restriction. Although they are no doubt friendly to the pensioners, although the subject has been brought before them on bills pending before them, they have not taken the responsibility of doing it. The House of Representatives, which has this year considered pension bills a great deal and sent to us three or four very important bills enormously increasing the pension-list, did not dare to remove this limitation, although they were considering the subject in the most liberal way.

And now upon the motion of a single Senator we are to do this upon a very doubtful estimate from the Department, with no recommendation from the Department. The Commissioner of Pensions does not invite it; the Secretary of the Interior does not invite it; no executive officer of the country advises it; our own committees do not advise it; the House of Representatives do not ask it. We are required upon a vote at the heel of the session to pass upon this important proposition on the motion of a single Senator, no doubt warmly supported as it is by the natural feelings of every man in this body, and especially of every man who was on the Union side in the recent war.

I merely mention these things to show you that this is a proposition of vital importance, that demands and must receive the considerate attention of the Senate. I do not like to stand in the way of this measure. I know that other Senators around me do not like to do it. We are compelled to vote upon a proposition against our hearts and feelings and solely on account of public reasons affecting the whole people of the United States.

I ask Senators whether this is a time at which we should make this enormous enlargement upon the immediate demands on the Treasury of the United States? When the Senate, in January, 1879, proposed to remove the then existing limitations upon arrears of pension it was at a time of great plenty; it was at a time when the resumption of specie payments had fully accomplished its work, and when the receipts of the Treasury were increasing enormously at the rate of fifty or one hundred million dollars a year.

Then, in 1879, Congress removed the limitations which had previously existed on pension. But it was a time very different from now. Then it was a time of plenty; there was an overflowing Treasury; but now we are in the times of pinch. Our revenues are already falling off. We know that the shrinkage in values in this country within the last year has been enormous, and is going on day by day, so that properties which were considered very valuable are now considered comparatively worthless and are scarcely the basis of credit. It is a time of uncertainty, which no man can doubt, the severity of which no man can doubt. We are called upon to assume a liability which an executive officer tells us will involve this year, or next year, or within the reach of the operation of this law, this enormous sum of money. I say, for one, much as I regret to oppose the proposition, I am compelled to do so.

The mere amount would not deter me if there was a legal demand and promise to pay. If there was a contract existing between the United States of America and these soldiers that we would pay them from the date of their discharge to this time, I would throw to the winds all considerations of severity upon the people of the United States; I would say we will fulfill our contracts and do by these soldiers what we would do by our bondholders or any other creditors, but I deny in toto that there is any obligation in law or in morals or in good faith to our soldiers to remove the restrictions of existing law as to the time and effect of filing their applications.

My honorable friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE], no doubt caught by the captivating argument of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], yielded his obedience to that argument and said he would vote for this sum of money. The very same authorities that were read in my presence, the very same laws that were read that convinced my friend from Maine, only strengthened me in the opinion that the time had come when we should not remove this limitation if we had any regard for the good of the people of this country.

Let us look at these laws—and I intend to refer to them as the Senator from Kansas did. I have looked at all these laws and I say here that from the close of the civil war until the passage of the act of 1879 there was always a restriction upon an application for arrears of pension. The law was imperative and very clear. Without reading all the laws read by the Senator from Kansas—and if I misquote the effect of them I will read them, because I have them all here to refer to—let me refer to the act of 1862, which was the first he read, which was the contract, if any was made. If there was any contract between the soldier and the United States, it was the acts of 1862 and 1864.

In the law of 1862 there was an express provision that if the application for a pension was not made within one year after the disability had accrued the pension should only take effect from the time of the application. Only one year was allowed, because at that time it was seen that if pensions were allowed to accrue and pile up on each other year after year there might be created a demand upon the Government which it would be most difficult and perhaps at times impossible to meet. Therefore when these services were being rendered in 1862, in the first act on this subject there was a limitation that the application should be made within one year after the disability, or else the pension should only commence from the date of the application. So in the act of 1864, the war still going on, the limitation was extended to three years, so that if a soldier entitled to a pension failed to apply for it within three years after the disability he could only receive his pension from the date of the application.

These were the contracts, if there was anything in the form of a contract, if a statute could make a contract. I deny that a statute of this kind is in the nature of a contract; it is a mere provision fixing the bounty or gift to be made by the Government of the United States. These soldiers were then fighting in our cause. If a contract was made it was made then, and by these two laws there was an express limitation as against arrears of pensions, in one case one year, and in the other case three years, so that if application was not made within this limited period of time the pension commenced from the date of the application.

That is the principle upon which Congress has uniformly acted. In all the bills that are now reported to us the pension uniformly takes effect in the deserving cases acted on in special bills from the date of the passage of the act. That is even more restricted than I should be willing to go, because I think we ought to go back to the date of the application in the Pension Office.

But in all our laws from beginning to end on this subject there have been limitations. So there are limitations as to all other claims upon the Government of the United States. There can be no limitation on Congress, because Congress can exercise full plenary powers and make appropriations that every executive officer must obey; but whenever we have regulated the action of an executive officer or of a court we have always limited that demand by some reasonable rule of limitation. We have established courts for the trial of cotton claims; we have established courts for the trial of claims of all kinds, and in every case we have made a limitation requiring that the demands should only bear interest or should commence from the date of the application or from some other fixed time, and that they should be made within five years or within three years; and executive officers are bound to observe the limitation.

Let us go a little further. In 1866 the war was over. Congress was generous to the soldiers, more generous in this country than in any other country of the civilized world; and rightly so, because the men they were dealing with were our own flesh and blood; they were men who volunteered to render important services to the country. Even after the war was over this same limitation was extended somewhat, but still applied, and a limitation of five years was fixed by the act of 1866, and if the claim was not filed within five years then no arrears were granted beyond the time of the date of the application.

Again, at a later period, I think in 1873 (the law was quoted by the Senator from Kansas correctly), it says expressly in the part of the statute he read and also in the clause which he did not read, that if application was not made within five years from the date of disability the arrears of pension should only be counted from the date of the filing of the last paper in the Pension Office. That was still more restrictive. They did not even go back to the date of the application, but to the date when the soldier had furnished all the evidence required by the law to secure him a pension, and his pension only commenced from the date when he filed his last paper, if the application was for a pension that occurred before the five years commenced.

So the law continued until the Senator from Kansas offered his bill in 1879 under the favorable circumstances that I have mentioned. That act broke down all the old limitations, barriers, and restrictions that up to that time had been contained in every pension law that had been passed by the Government of the United States. They all provided that after a certain time if the application extended beyond a period of years the applicant should have arrears of pension only from the date of application or from the time the proof was made complete. So these limitations continued in all our laws.

It was in 1879, under the circumstances I have mentioned, that the act for granting arrears of pension without limit as to time was passed. The first law that was passed excited surprise and remark. It was a loosely worded law, because it expressly provided that when arrears of pension were granted under the law of 1879 the same rate of pension that was granted then should extend back and apply to all the time that occurred after the death or disability. Although the soldier might have been slightly sick and partially well, or with a slight debility, yet by the particular features of that law the pension was granted at the full rate according to the condition of the pensioner at the time of his application.

But at the same session of the Congress which passed the law of 1879, by an amendment to an appropriation bill, seeing how dangerous were the provisions as they stood in the law of 1879, Congress limited the application and stated that in no case should the amount of pension extend beyond the character of disability at the time; so that all persons applying for arrears of pension under the act of 1879 as amended in the appropriation act of that session were compelled to show year by year the state of health, the condition of disability; and the amount of pension was limited by the condition from time to time.

In that same appropriation act there was a limit to applications for arrears of pensions to the 1st of July, 1880. It was a limitation made on sober second thought, made by the same Congress that granted the broad and general application for arrears. Under that law we have paid out, or there is now accruing, probably $100,000,000. I take the figures as they were given to me by the chairman of the Committee on Pensions.

Now, we are asked to extend the limitation, although Congress definitely fixed it so clearly that every soldier in this broad land of ours knew that from and after the 1st day of July, 1880, Congress had declared that all applications for arrears should cease. I believe that this law has been substantially acquiesced in. A few hard cases probably that appeal strongly to our sensibilities can be very well provided for by special acts. No application could be made for arrears of pension after July 1, 1880. Whenever any applications have been made to Congress in private bills, setting up special cases of hardships, they have been granted by Congress only from the passage of the act. If there are any such I should be glad to be informed by any member of the Committee on Pensions. Congress has uniformly acted upon this idea, and they have never had a case yet presented to them furnishing so strong a case in equity that they would extend a pension back and before the period of the passage of the act.

It was believed by the people of the United States that there was a limit to the arrears of pensions; that whatever we might see proper to give from time to time by our pension bills to the soldiers of the Union Army, to the soldiers of the Mexican war, or to the soldiers of our various wars, at least arrears of pension were not to be allowed by the express provision of the law. The business men of this country, the people of this country, the soldiers of the country, officers and men, knowing the law, have acquiesced in the justice of the principle.

It may be said if this money is justly due to the soldier that his mere neglect to apply for it for twenty years after his disability does not lessen the liability of the Government. He may have thought he would get well or something of that kind. I have had many touching letters of that character. Why, it is said, should he be cut off by a statute of limitations from claiming a pension back for his sufferings during all the twenty years? The answer to that is that no government in the world could live and endure and pay its obligations if it should undertake to cover all the equities past and all the arrearages that might be conjured up by the misfortunes of the future.

It may be that the Government of the United States would not be able at some time or other to pay the enormous sum that would be thus presented under the arrears of pensions. No government could act upon such a principle.

It is not right for the soldier to apply for the arrears. He knew the existence of the law, and why should he be allowed now to come in and make a demand for $4,000, $5,000, or $6,000 for the twenty years last past, thus throwing upon the Government an enormous demand which he refused for twenty years even to present to the Government? He does not stand in the light of one who had a right to make an appeal to us. Why did he not present the claim for pension before? Perhaps because he did not desire it, or because he was too proud to receive a pension from the Government. Perhaps he thought his disability would pass away. But he waived the demand. In every case he must have waived the demand. Three times he has had an opportunity under the existing law to present a claim for arrears of pension. The broadest latitude was given to him under the act of 1879. If, then, he did forego the opportunity to present his claim at a time when the law tendered him the money, he has no right now to embarrass the Government with his old claim, barred by the law and waived by his own neglect.

When these claims are presented now they are decided upon ex parte testimony. Time has obliterated many of the evidences which existed in the way of presenting any defense to these claims. They are founded upon ex parte testimony, now given under a strong bias of feeling. I know many neighborhoods where an application made for arrears of pension, or any application by a soldier of the Union Army, I do not care what it is, meets with the warm and generous feeling of every man. The result is that these claims are sometimes presented upon testimony ex parte in its nature which the Government is not at all prepared to resist.

I put my action upon the broad ground that no soldier who for a long period of time has waived his right to demand a pension has now a moral right or a moral equity to embarrass us with his old back claim for a pension which he has refused to assert for twenty years. Sir, twenty years would give absolute title to the possession of land in almost every State in the Union. Twenty years obliterates all the evidence by which these claims can be resisted. Twenty years would cut off the payment of a bond or a note, or even of a judgment. By the laws of all the States even a judgment is presumed to be paid after the lapse of fifteen years. Every debt yields to time, and time must cut off the claims of the soldier. The soldier who did not assert his claim within the time fixed by the law loses not only his legal obligation but he loses his moral obligation to demand it after that time.

I believe the assertion of this enormous claim at this time against the Government of the United States will be embarrassing even to the people of the United States. It would break down all restrictions upon claims hereafter. There would be no limit hereafter put upon them. You might as well strike down the proposition to limit it to some time this year.

For these reasons, without wasting any more time of the Senate, I shall feel reluctantly bound to vote against the pending proposition. I wish to see the bill amended with ample provisions to provide for such cases of hardship as have occurred in the lapse of time; but I would limit the application and all the relief we grant from and after the time the application is made.

With some knowledge of the feeling of the soldiers I do not believe they desire that large sums of money should now be given to soldiers who have lain idly by, who have refused to receive their pensions, I do not believe there is any general feeling of that kind. It is unjust to those who made their application in due time, and who have already received the money without embarrassment to the Treasury.

Executive officers of the Government can estimate and provide ample revenues to meet existing laws, but no sagacity would enable Congress to provide for claims not presented when payable, and asserted only at a period of hardship, to the amount of $246,000,000. There is no equity in it.

But there are classes of cases which do appeal to our sympathy, and which will command my vote to the fullest extent. There are many thousands, perhaps a hundred thousand soldiers, who may not be able, by the formal proof required by the Department under the existing law, to establish their claim. They may be disabled, sick, poor, needy, and dependent, but they may not be able to trace the cause of their disease back to the war. Nothing is more difficult, so the medical authorities say, than to state the origin and cause of disease.

I am therefore willing in this bill to give relief to every Union soldier who now labors under a disability which prevents him from laboring for himself and supporting his family. I am in favor of giving him relief with reasonable modifications, the restrictions contained in one of the pending amendments. If it appears his disability was caused by his own faults or his own vices I would not allow him anything except where the disability may be fairly or inferentially traced back to the war and he is dependent now upon his own labor—not the dependence of the rich farmer, with his bountiful crops, and cattle, and horses upon a thousand hills, but upon any man who is really needy and dependent upon others for support or upon his own labor, when he is unable to perform labor, I am willing to give him a pension even if he can not trace the disability back to the war, because after a service of two, three, or four years under the terrible strain that rested upon our Union soldiers in the war the fair inference is that if he is now disabled by certain classes of disease it may be reasonably inferred that he is disabled as a consequence of the war. I am willing to resolve all those doubts in his favor and give him now, whatever it may cost, a pension to the amount necessary to support him in the few years of his declining life if he is able to say that he is disabled from and dependent upon his labor, and that from the nature of the disability he probably was indebted to the war for that disability.

I am willing to go further than that. I am willing to relieve him from all unreasonable rules of testimony. The rule of the law and the rule of the Department which requires him to prove that when he entered the service he was a sound and able-bodied man was an unreasonable rule, because the Government only accepted sound and able men as reported by physicians competent and skilled in their art. I am willing to relieve him from all proof of that kind and assume that in every case where he was received as a soldier and served as a soldier he was a sound man when he entered the war.

I am also anxious and desirous of relieving those soldiers who left the Army at the close of the war, when the war was really over, after Grant and Sherman had marched their forces here in the presence of all the officers of the Government, when every hostile gun was laid down in submission in the South, when every rebel army was broken up. I am willing to give such a person the benefit of a full and honorable discharge, as having served through the war faithfully and truly, if his record so proves it. I believe there have been no cases of hardship so great, none so distressing, as those where good men, brave men, good soldiers, left the ranks after the war was over when they were sent off to fight Indians or sent into Texas to fight Mexico or held in durance vile, as they thought, more than a year after the war. Those persons ought to be relieved from the charge which has been made untruthfully, falsely, upon the records of the War Department against them.

I admire the manhood of the men. I have a letter before me stating the case of a man who, when he was ordered out to Utah three months after the war was over, told his officer that when he arrived at his home and they passed by it he intended to leave, giving him fair notice, and that whenever they demanded his service or wished to try him in any way his address was well known; that he had served out his time; that now his duty was to his wife and his children, having performed his full duty to the country, and he left the Army after the war was over in full compliance with the terms of his enlistment. To say that a Secretary of War or some officer of the Government could extend the period of that enlistment to some other war or some other trouble was an outrage and a shame, and I would relieve all persons who asserted their rights under the law and dared the authorities to arrest them and try them as deserters, who wanted a chance even to appeal to civil courts to pass upon the question of the duration of their term of service. I admire the spirit of those men, and I want now to relieve them and place them on the same footing as those who did go on and fight the Indians or who lay in Texas for months afterward, and who were finally disbanded when their services were no longer required anywhere on the face of the world.

Any reasonable demand made by Union soldiers I shall respond to as heartily as any one, but when their demand involves dangers to the people of this country or are unreasonable, I have the courage, I trust, to vote according to my convictions, even though it may be misunderstood by those for whom I have sincere respect. This is all I have to say.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, in the act of 1879 the removal of the limitation was extended one year and five months from the time the law was passed until July, 1880. The laws were not printed for weeks after that so as to be accessible to anybody. They were not circulated for months after the passage of that law. Those soldiers who knew the law and could present their claims presented them. There were thousands and tens of thousands of soldiers just as much entitled to arrearages of pensions who had no opportunity to present their claims and bring themselves within the law. There were hundreds and thousands of soldiers who placed in the hands of pension attorneys their claims that were not presented so to bring them within the law until after the time had passed, though no fault of those seeking pensions. There is no reason in law or in equity why that restriction of time should be applied to soldiers scattered through all the States of the Union, living in obscurity, living upon their own daily efforts for their bread, unacquainted with law, not knowing what beneficial law had been passed. There is no more reason why if they are entitled to arrearages of pension under that law they should not have them than that those who had them should not have them.

Sir, the time when the Government requires an application to be made is merely an intimation, a hint to those who may desire to claim the benefits of a pension to bring forward their claims as fast and as rapidly as they could and present them. It does not question the legality, it does not question the principle of the law. It is a mere notice to those who may claim it to come in as soon as they can. They failed to do that. Some of the cases most demanding pensions and most demanding arrears of pension within the knowledge of us all are those who failed in that year and five months, or you might almost say in the five months when you might reasonably suppose notice to have been spread through the different parts of the country where they could have been known, from availing themselves of the law.

So it is the opinion of the great body of the soldiers who survived, whether they have a right to pensions themselves or not, that that limitation ought to be removed. The great body of the defenders of this nation come solemnly before Congress in long array, by the resolutions of their Army posts, in all the ways in which they can express their views to Congress, and say "it is but just and right that our comrades who are entitled to pensions should receive them, although from motives of patriotism, or from believing that they could subsist without calling upon their Government, they neglected within that year and five months to present their claims."

But, sir, there is another consideration to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate. Arrearages of pensions do not carry any given amount of pension down through the years that have passed. Arrearages of pension, if I understand it aright, only calculate arrears according to the character and nature of disability from year to year. Admitting that, soldiers might not have been able to show such disability for the first five years or the first ten years since the war as to entitle them to a pension at all. They would be entitled to no arrears of pension. If they were entitled to $2 a month pension, as their proofs must show, their arrearages will only cover that, if I am right in my supposition. So if one of these pensioners is entitled to-day to $8 a month, and five years ago he was not entitled to a pension at all, and two years ago was only entitled to $4 a month, the arrearages are graded through all those years—some years no pension and no arrearages; some years a small pension and the corresponding amount of arrearages.

But I can not refuse to vote for this proposition with any feeling or consciousness that I am doing justice to men who have the same right to a pension with others who have received them, and who have the same right to arrearages of pension during the years that have passed that they would have had to a pension if their claims had been allowed. It is just; it is equitable.

In my judgment, the amount which would be demanded to meet these arrearages, running down through the grades of the past years, will not be and can not be in their very nature as great as has been suggested here. But if they are as great, when this session of Congress started the cry was given to the country that the Treasury was so full that from the sources of revenue known as customs duties the money was flowing into the Treasury in so great a quantity that it was absolutely necessary for morals and for good government to restrain that inward flow and prevent the accumulation which would be demoralizing to the country if it was permitted to go on.

Ah, sir, how much does it demoralize the country if that flow of money comes into the Treasury from one direction and flows out to sustain life and breath in the poor, crippled soldiers who made the country and saved the country which could have a treasury, and made it so profitable and so great and so growing that its ordinary accumulations filled the Treasury, to pay the little pittance to those who gave their power to have a treasury at all.

Every day, every week, every month of this session the pages of the RECORD are full of propositions from all kinds and classes and conditions of men in the House and in the Senate to find some way to stop the overflowing of our Treasury, even up until within the last two days; and yet we are met with the proposition that an overflowing Treasury is demoralizing the country, on the one hand, and, on the other, that we can not hold out the cup of cold water or the crust of bread to the saviors of the country.

If there be vitality enough left in the poor, sickly, worn-out soldiers who as yet have received no bounties from the Government, no pension to aid them in their sufferings and in their hunger—I say if there was life enough to warrant the exertion there must come a sardonic smile over the faces of these dying pensioners at the absurdity of the propositions laid before this Congress, the Senate and the House; and although their smile might be a ghastly smile, it would be one of derision for the men who refuse them the pittance they are entitled to receive and fear the demoralization of the country because there is already too much money in the Treasury and no way to dispose of it.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is one of the most eminent and illustrious of the living representatives of that great political organization at whose birth he assisted. He has been long in the public service. He promoted very largely the legislation by which the war for the Union was successfully waged to its close. He has been a Representative and Senator in Congress. He has been a distinguished finance minister. He has had respectable pretensions to the chief executive office of the nation. It will be gratifying to the country to understand that he deliberately announces the doctrine that pensions to the surviving soldiers of the war for the Union are not a contract, but that they are a charity or a gratuity which the nation can give or withhold as it pleases; that, in other words, the nation regards those who assumed those obligations which might, and in nearly half a million cases did, demand the sacrifice of life on the part of the enlisted men, in all those cases with regard to the survivors of those who were slain, with regard to those who were disabled and mutilated in the service, it rests with the Government to do precisely as it pleases, to give or to withhold a pension; that we are authorized under the contract of enlistment to treat the mutilated and disabled soldier as a hospitable and charitable citizen treats the vagrant and the tramp who applies at his area-door for a mouthful of food to keep him from starvation. I do not think the Senator from Ohio would have obtained many responses to the appeals which I have no doubt he made for the filling up of the gallant and courageous regiments that served from the State of Ohio if he had announced in that perilous period from 1861 to 1865 that there was no contract by which the surviving disabled soldier or the survivors of the families of those who perished should receive a pension.

The Senator states that he is not deterred in his vote against the proposed amendment by any considerations of the enormous sum of money that will be required to make this legislation effectual, if it should be adopted as the law. He alludes to the condition of the Treasury in 1879. He refers to the fact that then the Treasury, as he says, was in an overflowing condition, and intimates that one great reason why this amendment should not be adopted, and why what he calls these unjust and stale and oppressive claims, upon which these soldiers have slept for twenty years, should not be allowed, is because we are in a condition of poverty and apprehension of danger in the future. If I have been able to read correctly the reports of the different officers of the Treasury as to the financial condition of the United States at this time, it is one of plethora and not of penury. The great difficulty that we have to contend with is how to get rid of our surplus in some respectable way. There is more money coming into the Treasury from the ordinary resources and ordinary revenue than we can possibly appropriate; and yet the Senator from Ohio gravely assures us that with regard to an amendment which will provide for an appropriation to be extended over a period of four, five, or six years he is going to vote againt it because it will result in danger and disaster to the country.

It seems to me that that consideration is hardly worthy of refutation. When we reflect upon the appropriations that have been made, the appropriations that are pending, the demands that have been supported by the Senator himself upon repeated occasions during this session, I do not think he really wants the country to understand that there is such a diminution of the revenues as threatens us with serious danger with regard to the necessary expenditures of the country, both for the interest on the public debt and for the support of all the departments of the Government. I do not believe the Senator from Ohio is absolutely sincere in that declaration, or if he is sincere I doubt whether he has sufficiently examined the question to be able to pronounce an authoritative opinion, because I believe that the estimate of those most competent to judge is that after all demands this year have been satisified there will be a surplus revenue of from $60,000,000 to $100,000,000.

I do not propose to rehearse the statement that I made when I was last upon the floor with regard to the action that has been taken by Congress upon the subject of the time when pensions, if allowed, are to commence to run, but I will ask the Senator from Ohio if he does not know that in the case of every pensioner who filed his application prior to July 1, 1880, when the pensions were allowed he has been paid from the date of his disability? I will ask him further with regard to all those cases filed before that day in which the application is pending but not yet allowed, in case the allowance is made, if he is not also equally informed that the pension when allowed will date from the discharge or disability?

The Senator from Ohio says there can be no contract; that there can be no possible obligation resting upon the Government in consequence of our preceding legislation. Does the Senator gravely argue here, that five consecutive acts of Congress, adopted after debate, approved by the President of the United States, acted upon year by year, form no binding and obligatory precedent upon which these men had a right to rely? It appears to me, with all deference to the great experience and to the vast services and to the eminent standing of the Senator from Ohio, that unless he can base his objection to this amendment upon more substantial grounds than he has yet presented, they are not such as to entitle them to be considered by a majority of his party associates.

If I remember correctly—and I do not think my memory is treacherous upon this subject—a Republican State convention in Ohio within two years adopted as one of the principles of its platform a distinctive declaration that the limitation in the arrears act of 1879 ought to be removed. I know that a Republican State convention in the State of Iowa did the same thing, and I am equally confident, because I read it in the hearing of the Senate the other day, that the national convention of the party to which the Senator belongs, assembled during the current month, deliberately adopted and avowed as one of its declarations a resolution to the effect that the limitation in the act of January 25, 1879. ought to be repealed. Yet before the ink with which that declaration was drawn is dry, while it is yet moist upon the paper on which it was written, the Senator from Ohio deliberately disavows it, and declares that it is not binding upon the conscience nor upon the political action of any of those who may be called upon to vote on the proposition when it is presented.

I am not the custodian of any man's conscience. I do not assume to suggest that in any manner whatever the widest possible liberty of individual judgment should be infringed or abridged. I assert and maintain that right for myself and I concede it to others; but I say if that declaration is to be disregarded, if it is to be declared by those who are most competent to speak as in no sense whatever obligatory as as a declaration of party faith or party action, then it will be entirely legitimate for any opponent of the Republican party to say that all declarations may be equally disregarded. If that is to be understood to be the rule upon which declarations of party faith are made and by which they are to be regarded, then no political organization can satisfactorily establish a claim to public confidence. It would be well in my judgment for party managers, like the controllers of successful railroad corporations, to put in full notice, for the observation of all mankind, a declaration that passengers are not allowed to stand on the platform.

The Senator from Ohio has seen fit to characterize the legislation that has been had upon this subject hitherto as ill-advised and improvident; to say that it was sentimental and emotional; that it did not arise out of any contract; that it did not spring from an obligation which had been recognized by repeated acts of legislation; but it was an ebullition of beneficence and charity that Congress saw fit to enact in 1879 and in preceding years. He intimates that no soldier who served his country in her time of need and of peril has any right after the expiration of the period of time that has elapsed since the war closed to come in and harass and annoy and embarrass the Government by setting up a pretension to claims whose validity he has waived by his failure to apply for their recognition.

In the face of the intimation of the Senator from Ohio with regard to the effects of the act of 1879, I beg leave to say that, in my judgment, it was one of the most beneficent statutes that any Congress ever enacted. I wish the Senator from Ohio, or those who are opposed to the pending amendment to the bill, would be good enough in their specifications to declare what interest of the Government ever suffered in consequence of the demands made upon the Treasury by that statute. The interest upon the public debt has always been paid. Every department of the Government, the Army, the Navy, and the Interior, has been amply supported. The public credit has been sustained. If any interest of this Government has suffered I have certainly yet failed to hear of it. The money that was appropriated under that statute did not go abroad, nor was it retained at home to swell the coffers of the opulent. It went into the hands of those who needed it. It served to support those who were in many cases suffering for the necessaries of life. It paid off debts upon the farm and the homestead; it sufficed to educate children; it enabled many a suffering wife and mother to obtain relief from demands that would otherwise have been fatal to her health and to her happiness. I contend that in every way in which it can be regarded, so far from having been a statute that was detrimental or injurious or pernicious, it was beneficent in every aspect of the case, and if there is any reason that has been offered, any that can be presented, why this amendment should not be adopted I have yet to hear it.

The Senator from Ohio in his allusion to the statutes which I read the other day, failed to quote all to which I called the attention of the Senate. He read partially from three enactments, but there were five in all; and in each one of those enactments the principle was distinctly recognized that whenever the right to a pension was established satisfactorily to the Department then the payment was to begin from the date of the discharge of the pensioner or from the time when the disability was incurred. The Senator did not refute, and he can not refute, the other controlling and conclusive fact that with regard to all those pensioners who made their application prior to July 1, 1880, this principle has been recognized, and it is not true, as the Senator from Ohio would seem to argue, that here was a donation or a gift of any specific amount of money to a pensioner to which he was not entitled under his contract. It was simply the declaration that when he was found to be pensionable the rate of pension should run from the time when the disability was proven to have existed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, a few words only in reply to the Senator from Kansas. He says that under all the laws read by him the pension commences from the date of disability. I assert with equal confidence that all the pensions under laws prior to 1879 commenced from the date of disability if they were applied for within the period of limitation prescribed by the act, and that in all the laws he read from every one of them contained a period of limitation commencing with one year, then during the war three years, then after the war five years, and it was so continued.

I admit that all arrears of pensions were paid under the act of 1879, but that was the law which authorized all pensions, without respect to limitation, to commence from the date of disability. I believe I am correct in that.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator is entirely incorrect. In one of the statutes that I read there is an express declaration that the Commissioner of Pensions shall immediately adjust the arrears that are found to be due under the extension and pay them to the parties.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have the statutes all here marked, and I can take occasion to put them in.

I again assert that the law in every case says that if the claim is filed within a period of five years, or three years, or one year, then in such case the pension shall commence with the date of disability; but if it is filed after the period of one year, or three years, or five years, as the case may be, it shall commence in some cases from the date of application and in other cases from the time the last paper was filed; so that great masses of applicants were excluded from all arrears of pension in every case where they filed the claim after the period of limitation applied.

Mr. INGALLS. The act of 1879 did exactly the same thing.

Mr. SHERMAN. Under the act of 1879 all these cases were opened and arrears of pension were paid, even the claims that had been previously settled under the pre-existing law.

Mr. INGALLS. I know the Senator does not wish to misrepresent the facts, because the Senator would not claim that under the act of 1879 applicants received double arrearages.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, not double arrearages.

Mr. INGALLS. Exactly; but the impression the Senator makes is that they received double arrearages.

Mr. SHERMAN. The limitations are all in the same language, except a difference as to time:

And in cases in which the application is not filed during the said year, pensions granted to persons employed as aforesaid shall commence with the date of the filing of the application.

In the great mass of the pensions granted on claims made between 1866 and 1873, the claimants got pensions only from the date of their applications, because their applications were filed after the three years or after the five years fixed by law; but the act of 1879 gave all the persons who had received their pensions back pensions for all the time before that. That is perfectly manifest, and it is shown by the public documents.

The Senator says that I commented severely upon the act of 1879. I say that act was confessedly defective, because Congress at the same session by another law changed very materially its most important features. For instance, the act of January, 1879, expressly provided that the rate of pension fixed at the time of the granting of the application should extend back to the date of disability, and under that ruling and the construction of the plain language of the law, large sums of money were paid for a time when there was no disability. The rate fixed at the time the application was acted upon ran clear back to 1862, or whatever time the discharge occurred. Congress hastily in the same session corrected that by declaring that the disability should only be fixed from time to time and from year to year.

Again, the act of January, 1879, omitted all period of limitation, while Congress at the same session changed that and fixed the limitation on the 1st of July, 1880, falling back upon a period of limitation.

I say, whatever may be thought of the principle of the act of 1879, it was defective in these important particulars, the correction of which vitally changed the character of it, and very largely saved the Government from unreasonable applications for pensions.

But that is not all. My friend from Kansas now, I think for the first time in the Senate (I have never known it before), introduces a party platform as a guide for us in our legislative duties here as sworn Senators representing States. If that has ever been done before I do not remember it. He not only quotes the national platform, but he quotes the platforms of State conventions as our guide. When I remember how those platforms are framed, and I have participated in framing some of them; when I remember how even the national platform of our great party was framed recently at Chicago by some forty-two men meeting in sweltering heat for three or four hours, men some of whom had never seen each other before, who were suddenly called upon to frame a platform embracing every object of public policy, every desire of the Republican party, and put it in set phrase in four hours, to be reported on the spur of the moment—to call that the guide of Senators and to influence Senators in deliberate action on their public duty here, I think is extraordinary.

Sir, I have as much respect for the opinions of my associates and my party as anybody else, or as anybody ought to have; but I assume that it is the Congress of the United States, chosen according to the Constitution, which must prescribe the laws of this country, and while the party platforms may indicate the general tendency and policy of a party, I believe this is the first time in the American Senate when party creeds have been read to us to influence our action. Our Democratic friends would be in a sorry predicament if I should read the various party platforms that have been made for them in the last twenty years for their guide on the tariff question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They are in a sorry predicament anyway.

Mr. SHERMAN. They are in a sorry predicament any way, my friend suggests. So they are; but I take it that in the Congress of the United States each Senator for himself in the performance of his sworn duty must do what he thinks is right, and certainly must have some better guide than a mere party platform hastily reported in the manner in which I have stated.

The very fact that in the act of 1879 there was a limitation made by the Republicans, made by the Senator himself, shows that there is wisdom in these limitations; and now his effort to abrogate the limitation without the report of any committee of this body, merely founded upon the earnest desire we all have to do what is right to be done for the soldiers of our country, is the best exposition of this movement, if it should succeed, that I could possibly give. Even in this measure we have fixed a period of limitation of only four months.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] complains that the soldiers had only a year and a half to know of the limitation under the law of 1879, and that some of them did not see it. Sir, that is a commentary upon the intelligence of our brave soldiers that I did not expect to hear from any one. Every man who served in the Union Army knew not only of the grant of arrears of pensions, but knew the limitation of that grant, and every man who desired to benefit himself by that law knew enough to make his application within due time. To assert the contrary is to assume an ignorance on the part of the brave soldiers that I would not impute to them. So now you propose to put as a limit the 1st of October next, and you give them four months to know this law for their benefit. You say that seventeen or eighteen months was not enough four years ago, and now you give them four months.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They are entitled to it for all time if they are entitled at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said so. If they are entitled to it at all they are entitled to it for all time.

Mr. INGALLS. So they are.

Mr. SHERMAN. Every claim that is asserted against the Government of the United States from the foundation of this Government has been subject to limitation. In every government in the world limitations are a part of the fundamental law. Under the law which allowed the holders of the bonds of the Revolutionary war to fund them into the various securities provided by the First Congress there was a short period of limitation, and all the bonds that were not funded in that way under that law were entirely cut off and have never been paid.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So with the legal-tender demand notes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, in the case of the legal-tender demand notes of the Revolutionary war the holders were allowed five or six years to present them for redemption at the rate of one dollar on a thousand, I believe it was, or whatever was the rate fixed by the law, and every dollar that was not presented under the limitation of that law has never been paid. I have seen myself the continental money by the hundreds and thousands of dollars that no one ever thought of presenting to the Government of the United States, because the law expressly allowed a reasonable time to present and fund those securities, and those that were not then presented have never been paid. There is a law upon the statute-book which limits every right a man can possess, every claim that can be asserted against the Government, and no one has power to disregard that law except that the Congress of the United States may from time to time in special cases, as they see fit, pay any debt, however old or antiquated. But there are limitations always imposed upon executive officers and upon judicial officers as well. The idea of passing a claim of any kind whatever without some limitation as to the time of presenting it, even in a court of justice, would not be tolerated in any tribunal. Twenty years bar the right to property; fifteen years bar a suit upon a note; six years under the laws of this District bar a claim made, however honest, between private citizens. Can not a Government protect itself by the same laws? Is it right to declare them unjust? Is it not, on the other hand, unjust to accumulate these claims, allow them to roll over and over, because the party did not need the money or was too proud to assert a right to the claim, and then demand it in gross at the end of twenty years when the Government is totally unprepared to defend against his claim?

I think the Senator from Kansas misrepresented my position. I know he did not intend to do it, but he is a little too apt to do that. He stated it too strongly. I did not say that these pensions were merely charitable gifts to the soldiers. I did not use the word "charity" in regard to them. I said these pensions were granted for disabilities fixed by law, within limits defined by law, and those limits were just as much a part of the law granting the pensions as the amount of pension itself. While the war was going on we fixed the period of limitation at one year, extending it toward the close of the war to three years, during which the claim should be presented. After the war was over we allowed five years in which to present it, and now the Senator thinks it is hard that we should cut it off at the end of nineteen years.

The wisest part of the arrears-of-pension act was that provision, which was contained in the appropriation bill, which required the claims to be presented within a reasonable time, at a time when their payment could easily be made and met; and now to open the door again is to embarrass the Government of the United States by claims which have never been presented, which have never been asserted, and which it is now unjust to assert. I say a soldier who, knowing that he was entitled to a pension, waived that right because he desired to be free from that obligation waived it forever, just as every man waives a right who fails to assert it according to the provisions of the law; and it is not right, after he has lain quiet for twenty years, for him to assert the claim at a time when the very accumulation of these claims makes a burden upon the public Treasury. The Government certainly ought to have the right to protect itself by reasonable restrictions and limitations as to the time and manner of presenting the claim.

The Senator says that I represent the Treasury as being in a state of penury. I did not say anything of the kind. I said that the times were hard upon the people of the United States; that securities were losing their value; that the price of wheat and all kinds of production had fallen off; that iron and all the productions of manufactures had fallen. Times are harder; our revenues are decreasing. It is true they have been bountiful in the last three or four years, and we have this year been able to pay $100,000,000 of the public debt; but we all know very well how rapid and sudden changes take place in our condition. I knew one time, in 1857, when Congress reduced the tariff largely and reduced the income of the Government, it adjourned with twenty-odd millions of money in the Treasury, and when we met in December that same year we had to issue Treasury notes in order to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government. The same thing occurred to a less extent in 1873, when the revenues rapidly fell off from an overflowing Treasury until our revenues disappeared and we were unable at that time to pay the sinking fund, and for years we were not able to meet the demands of the sinking fund.

We are coming now upon a time, not of penury, because the people of this country are just as rich as before, but we are at a time of reduced prices, of reduced income, when people will be compelled all over the country to resort again to habits of economy and look well to investments and speculations. I have no doubt it will be a more healthy time. I believe in such a time people are better off than they are in a time of overflowing abundance, when wild speculation runs rampant; but at the same time prudent men must be cautious and not saddle the Government with the vast weight of obligation that might come upon us in four or five years by the adoption of this amendment. One hundred and thirty-six thousand pension claims have been filed since July, 1880, every one of which will be entitled to arrears if this measure is passed as soon as the clerks can make up the accounts. There ought to be no delay, as there was under the former law. If these claims are allowed they must be passed, and passed promptly. There are 136,000 claims filed which are entitled to the benefit of this measure; and if they draw from the Treasury anything like the amount that is estimated by the Commissioner of Pensions it will make a burden upon the people of the United States. A burden for what? For a debt which each individual has allowed to lie for nineteen years, ignoring and refusing to present the claim.

I say there is no justice and no equity in it. I should not be afraid to go before a crowd of any of the Union soldiers of the United States, most of whom have received their pensions who are entitled to them, and to present the arguments that I have made to-day. I believe I would receive their verdict that under the circumstances there ought to be an end to these claims for pensions of twenty years ago. Pensions now applied for should be given liberally according to the necessities of the time, but the back pensions of those who would not apply for them when the Government presented them to their consideration ought to be waived forever. I believe that would be the judgment of prudent, sensible, candid, and fair soldiers. I believe a provision such as I have mentioned, giving to those who are in need on account of their disability if it arose probably from the war, or arose under circumstances that probably originated in the war, would give bounteous relief. It would go just where the shoe pinches to relieve the men who are needy and not to relieve those who have lain for twenty years on their rights. It would bring food to the poor; it would give homes to the homeless. It would bring relief to men who are sore in need, and not give $2,000, $3,000, $4,000, even $6,000 to those who for twenty years refused to even ask for what the law gave them.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand the Senator from Ohio to insist that no pension should be allowed in any case where application has not been hitherto made.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no; I never said that.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator said that no man who had slept on his claim for twenty years ought now to be heard.

Mr. SHERMAN. For back pension.

Mr. INGALLS. That he should not make a demand on the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; for back pension. The Senator may not catch me in that way.

Mr. INGALLS. I had no design to catch the Senator; but I wish to present this view of the case to him: If he admits that a man who was a soldier has the right to apply now for a pension on account of disability incurred in the military service during the war and to have that adjudicated at this time, why has he not just as good a right to demand that, if allowed, his pension shall be granted from the date when his disability was incurred if satisfactorily proven, as the man who filed his claim prior to July, 1880?

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe that every soldier in the Union Army, who can bring himself within the terms of the laws, has a right to apply for a pension under those laws as they now stand to-day, made by the Senator himself with the limitations and restrictions imposed by the pension acts. I do not want to impair in the slightest degree the right of any soldier to apply for a pension under existing law. On the contrary I wish to extend those laws so as to grant pensions to those who can not under existing law receive them, by giving to those who are needy, for disabilities actually incurred and who are now suffering, but I do not want them to lay claim for pensions that have been barred by the law of the Senator's own framing, nor do I want to extend that law so as to open up the door to the presentation of old, stale claims. I do not wish to limit or diminish in any respect the right which any pensioner has under the existing law as it stands to-day to get any money which the law allows him, but it is proposed to go clear beyond that and to extend pensions in every case under the pending amendment. I think a man has no right, moral or legal or equitable, to make the assertion of a claim now running clear back to the war when he refused time and time again for eighteen years to present his claim under the existing law.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Ohio has more than once alluded to the limitation in the act of 1879 as having been placed there by me.

Mr. SHERMAN. Did you not vote for it?

Mr. INGALLS. The limitation as a limitation in the act of 1879 was absolutely removed. There was no limitation placed in the act of 1879; it was absolutely abrogated, and that was my conviction at the time, and that has been my conviction ever since. As I said in the debate the other day, the limitation that was placed there was a compromise. It never was agreed to by me. And so far from the act having been amended in consequence of the action of the Committee on Pensions, it was amended by the Appropriations Committee and not by the Committee on Pensions in consequence of certain views that they had, as I believe unjustly, and enforced upon the Senate. The limitation that was imposed in the act of 1879 was imposed by the Appropriations Committee. It was placed there on the 3d of March, and it was not in the act of January of that year. I never consented to it. It was not reported from the committee of which I was a member, and I have always opposed it. I have always believed that the limitation was illogical and unjust, and therefore when the Senator refers to my action as having voluntarily placed a limitation upon this principle, he does me injustice, unintentionally of course.

Mr. SHERMAN. When I referred to the act of 1879 I referred both to the act of January 25, 1879, and the act of March 3, 1879, regarding them as parts of the same law.

Mr. INGALLS. The act of January 25 was reported from the Pensions Committee and the act of March 3 was reported from the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to put the Senator in a wrong position. He says that he reported the act of January, 1879, and he is responsible for that, but he says he did not vote for the other.

Mr. INGALLS. No; I did not say that I did not vote for it. I did vote for it. I said it was against my judgment, that I was in favor of passing the law of arrears, the act of removing the limitation on arrears generally, without any further limitation on it, and I am not responsible for the act of March 3, 1879.

Mr. SHERMAN. Here are two laws passed by the same Congress at the same session within forty days of each other, the one limiting and relating to the other. I spoke of the pension act of 1879 granting these two laws as a matter of course. The act expressly does provide:

Provided, The application for such pension has been or is hereafter filed with the Commissioner of Pensions prior to the 1st day of July, 1880, otherwise the pension shall commence from the date of filing the application.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the date of that law?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is March 3, 1879.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Forty days after the other. I propose to stand upon this law. That was the judgment of Congress, the deliberate judgment of Congress. The first act was defective in the measure I pointed out, and that evidently attracted the attention of Congress, and Congress, whether the Senator approved it or not, did put this limitation upon it; and these two laws together are what are commonly called the arrears-of-pension act of 1879, one following only forty days after the other. That is the law now, and I am willing to stand by it.

The same Congress that gave these enormous arrears of pension fixed the limitation, and I wish to stand upon that limitation, and not play hide and go seek any further on this subject, but to stand on a limitation that was made after full consideration by a friendly Congress, which wisely limited it, the wisest part of the whole legislation being the limitation put upon the arrears.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. As I do not know how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES]. If he were here he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HILL. I am paired on this question with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. MCMILLAN. My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is absent and is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN]. If my colleague were here he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 39; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Allison,	Dolph,	McMillan,	Pike,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to move an amendment to the first section of this Mexican pension bill, and part of the amendment is to strike out the words in lines 11 and 12 of section 1, "actually served with the Army or Navy of the United States in Mexico in said war." I mention this fact in order that I may inquire of the Chair whether, a vote having been taken on striking out those words, it would be in order now in connection with an amendment to the rest of the section to move to strike them out again. I will take that course unless there is objection, because it enables me to get at the amendment which I desire to move. Unless some Senator is disposed to make a point of order I can get at it more readily in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator state the words he desires to strike out?

Mr. HARRISON. The words are: "actually served with the Army or Navy of the United States in Mexico in said war," in lines 11 and 12. I believe there was a motion to strike those words out the other day and that it was voted down. What I want to get at is to put this descriptive part of the bill as to the soldiers who are to be pensioned upon the basis of some actual service or presence in Mexico. I can reach the matter——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say to the Senator from Indiana that it is his impression that a motion like this has been already tried and lost. If so, the Senator can only renew it when the bill shall be reported to the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. I will then modify my amendment so as to avoid that point of order. I move to strike out all after the word "who," in line 7, down to and including the word "aforesaid," in line 9, and to insert in lieu thereof:

Who, being duly enlisted, actually served fourteen days with the Army of the United States in Mexico or on the coast or frontier thereof, or en route thereto in the war with that nation, or."

I call the attention of the Secretary to the fact that I have copied in the words I send to the desk some of the words of the text of the bill simply to show the connection. I do not mean to duplicate the words of the text.

My object in moving this amendment—and I do not want to discuss it—is simply to limit this pension to those who served fourteen days in Mexico or on the coast or frontier thereof, or en route thereto. Certainly that is broad enough and liberal enough. It excludes that large number of soldiers and sailors who had no relation to the Mexican war at all; and I appeal to the Senator from Kentucky to know whether there is any reason why the commander at the Washington navy-yard or the officer commanding at Fort Brady up at the Sault Ste. Marie or the officer commanding in New York harbor or in Boston harbor during the war with Mexico should be pensioned on account of that war?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Kentucky will respond right there, if allowed, to the Senator from Indiana by saying that there is no such possibility by the provisions of this bill. This provision, as I understand, was put in here in order to embrace some soldiers who served in Texas and Resaca and Palo Alto under General Taylor and were called into service only for sixty days; and certainly men who served in those battles, if any of them survive, ought to be entitled to a pension.

The clause was put in for that purpose. There was no navy or army there then. The Navy had not been called down there, but the call was for troops for sixty days, for ninety days, and afterward for twelve months, and then for the war. Many of the troops who served at Resaca, and Palo Alto, and Brownsville were suddenly summoned into the service the moment they arrived, and fought in two or three of the most splendid battles during the war. This provision, I understand, was put in by the House in order to cover the case of those few men, and I am opposed to the amendment because it will require the bill to go back to the House, and everybody knows that if it goes back there it will fail to become a law at this session.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Kentucky has not answered my question, or at least has not given any reason for the opinion which he expresses. Look at the terms of this bill:

The Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the names of the surviving officers and enlisted men, including marines, militia, and volunteers, of the military and naval services of the United States who served sixty days in the war of 1846 and 1847 and 1848 with Mexico.

I undertake to say that if there was a state of war, as there was between these nations, every sailor, on every ship of the United States, and every soldier at any post or garrison of the United States, made a part of that army and navy described there.

Mr. WILLIAMS. By no means.

Mr. HARRISON. It does not require that he should be in Mexico. It does not require that he should take any part in the military operations against Mexico. It only requires that he should be enlisted in the Army or Navy of the United States, and serving with that Army or Navy in the war with Mexico he was liable to go there.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would ask the Senator a question right there. Does he say that in the Navy of the United States the squadron in the Mediterranean would come in?

Mr. HARRISON. I think so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course not. Only those who were ordered to Mexico to engage in that service would come in under this, and the proposition of the Senator himself is to make the minimum fourteen days. Every Senator knows that no man could serve a single day in any battle in Mexico or near Mexico who had not been more than fourteen days in the service to get there and get back.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not proposing to affect that clause of the bill which pensions every man who was engaged in a battle. I let that stand. I am simply trying to limit this to those who really went to Mexico or who were on the coast thereof, and I have even included those who spent fourteen days in trying to get there and never got there; but I do desire to exclude that part of the Army of the United States and that part of the Navy of the United States who had no connection with the war with Mexico, who were discharging the ordinary duties of soldiers or of naval officers and of sailors in time of peace, not put to any peril, not put to the endurance of any hardship at all; and if I am not much mistaken this bill as described here would pension every such soldier and sailor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It will not pension a single one of them.

Mr. MITCHELL. I call for the reading of the bill as it will be with the proposed amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the pending amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 7, after the word "States," it is proposed to strike out:

Who served sixty days in the war of eighteen hundred and forty-six and eighteen hundred and forty-seven and forty-eight with Mexico, and who, being enlisted as aforesaid.

And insert in lieu thereof:

Who, being duly enlisted, actually served fourteen days with the Army or Navy of the United States in Mexico, or on the coast or frontier thereof, or en route thereto in the war with that nation, or.

So as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the names of the surviving officers and enlisted men, including marines, militia, and volunteers of the military and naval services of the United States, who, being duly enlisted, actually served fourteen days with the Army or Navy of the United States in Mexico, or on the coast or frontier thereof, or en route thereto, in the war with that nation, or actually served with the Army or Navy of the United States in Mexico in said war.

Mr. HARRISON. No; that latter part of it is not correct. Strike out down to "or were actually engaged in a battle."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Including all to the word "battle?"

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir; strike out also "that were actually engaged in battle." That is left as it stood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator then would strike out after the words "United States," in line 7, down to and including the word "battle," at the end of line 11.

Mr. HARRISON. No, sir. The amendment is to strike out all after the word "who," in line 7, down to and including the word "aforesaid," in line 11; and to insert after the word "who" "being duly enlisted;" so that it will then read "who being duly enlisted actually served fourteen days with the Army or Navy of the United States in Mexico in the war with that nation, or on the coast thereof," where that part comes in.

Mr. HARRIS. Does not the Senator mean line 9 instead of line 11? There is no "aforesaid" in line 11.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was about to call attention to that.

Mr. HARRISON. Perhaps I have a different print. That must be the difficulty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will send to the Senator a copy of the bill as the Secretary has it.

Mr. HARRISON. It should be, after the word "who," in line 7, to strike out all down to and including the word "Mexico," in line 9; so as to read:

The surviving officers and enlisted men, including marines, militia, and volunteers of the military and naval services of the United States, and being duly enlisted.

Then at the beginning of line 10, after the word "served," insert "fourteen days;" so as to read:

Actually served fourteen days with the Army or Navy of the United States in Mexico.

I had a misprint of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to lay the amendment of the Senator from Indiana on the table.

Mr. HARRISON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky moves to lay the amendment upon the table, upon which the Senator from Indiana asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Before the vote is taken I should like to have the bill read as it would stand if amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a misapprehension as to the nature of the amendment. The Chief Clerk will endeavor to have it correct in a moment. The proposed amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 7, after the word "States," it is proposed to strike out:

Who served sixty days in the war of eighteen hundred and forty-six and eighteen hundred and forty-seven and forty-eight with Mexico, or who, being enlisted as aforesaid.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

Who, being duly enlisted, actually served fourteen days with the Army or Navy of the United States in Mexico, or on the coast or frontier thereof, or en route thereto in the war with that nation.

So as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the names of the surviving officers and enlisted men, including marines, militia, and volunteers of the military and naval services of the United States, who, being duly enlisted, actually served fourteen days with the Army or Navy of the United States in Mexico, or on the coast or frontier thereof, or en route thereto in the war with that nation, actually served with the Army or Navy of the United States in Mexico.

Mr. HARRISON. No; you do not want to repeat that. That takes down to the word "or," in line 11, "or were actually engaged in battle." The mistake grew out of the fact that I had copied in the amendment some part of the text of the bill simply to show how it reads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as corrected by the Senator will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "States," in line 7, it is proposed to strike out—

Who served sixty days in the war of eighteen hundred and forty-six and eighteen hundred and forty-seven and forty-eight with Mexico, or who, being enlisted as aforesaid, actually served with the Army or Navy of the United States in Mexico in said war.

And insert in lieu thereof—

Who, being duly enlisted, actually served fourteen days with the Army or Navy of the United States in Mexico, or on the coast or frontier thereof or en route thereto in the war with that nation.

So as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the names of the surviving officers and enlisted men, including marines, militia, and voluteers, of the military and naval services of the United States, who, being duly enlisted, actually served fourteen days with the Army or Navy of the United States in Mexico, or on the coast or frontier thereof, or en route thereto, in the war with that nation, or were actually engaged in a battle in said war, and were honorably discharged, &c.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana what is the particular magic or mystery about "fourteen?"

Mr. HARRISON. Nothing in the world. It was simply the term that was fixed in the act for the soldiers of the war of 1812. The amendment is broader now than I would frame it if I were framing it to express my own views, but I had supposed that the temper of the Senate was such that they would hardly let it stand sixty days in Mexico, and, therefore, I made it fourteen days in that country.

Mr. PLUMB. I understand that is an innovation on the principle established by the bill, because I think it requires sixty days' service to entitle to a pension, and it seems to me it would be better to adopt that rule and have it uniform rather than to adopt a new one in regard to a particular class of cases.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator moves to change the "fourteen" to "sixty," I will accept the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think this motion to lay on the table is debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending motion is one to lay on the table. These inquiries are made by unanimous consent pending that motion. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky that the amendment lie on the table, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS].

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] upon all questions except some amendments in regard to which I reserved the right to vote, but this is not one of them. I therefore withhold my vote. Otherwise, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN].

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—25.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. HARRISON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Just one word; I do not want to make a speech. This amendment is perfectly harmless in itself; it is rather to the advantage of the Mexican-war soldiers than otherwise, because it makes the limit of fourteen days the minimum service entitling them to a pension instead of sixty days as the bill itself provides. My only objection to it in God's world is that it requires that the bill shall go back to the House. At this stage of the session you can see how the bill will be affected by that. That is the only objection on earth I have to the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Kentucky is very much mistaken in his statement. The bill as it stands pensions every man who was one day in the Mexican war, or a half a day if he actually landed in Mexico. It pensions him if he never started for Mexico; pensions him if he was in a camp or rendezvous; pensions him if he was commander of a fort in New York Harbor. My amendment is sufficiently liberal, but it is not quite so liberal as the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is perfectly apparent that no man could have been a single day in the service in Mexico, or in a battle in Mexico, who had not been in the service more than fourteen days. It was a thousand miles from their home; it took a month to get there. Then the moment the soldier arrived at Resaca or Palo Alto, Vera Cruz or elsewhere, he went right into battle.

As I said before, this clause was put in the House bill simply to cover the cases of a few men who were with General Taylor at Resaca de la Palma and Palo Alto and Brownsville and Monterey. The effect of the Senator's amendment will not be to damage the soldiers of the Mexican war at all; it is rather to their advantage than otherwise, because nobody was in any battle or was in the service a single day in Mexico who had not been in the service of the country more than fourteen days.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON]. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. GARLAND (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS].

Mr. MCMILLAN (when Mr. SABIN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is paired on this question with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] and on all subsequent votes on this bill.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS. I should vote "nay" but for the fact that I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. I therefore decline to vote.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired on all questions with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN.]

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—35.

Aldrich,	Gorman,	McMillan,	Plumb,
Allison,	Groome,	Manderson,	Riddleberger,
Blair,	Hale,	Miller of Cal.,	Saulsbury,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. I offer the following amendment to be added to section 1:

Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not extend to or embrace any Senator or Representative of the Forty-eigth Congress.

I offer the amendment because I believe that those who are making the law ought not to profit by the law, and I hope the friends of the Mexican pension bill will vote for the amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Texas, I know, will appreciate my motive and feel that I have entire and absolute respect and goodwill for him when I move to lay that on the table.

Mr. MAXEY. If the Senator will pardon me for one moment——

Mr. INGALLS. I withdraw the motion to allow the Senator to speak.

Mr. MAXEY. I offer the amendment in good faith, because I desire it adopted. From the first time the Mexican pension bill was brought before the Senate I placed on record time and again an expression that personally I desired no benefit from it. I served in Mexico longer than any other member of this body. I was there nearly two years without having seen the United States during that time. I do not believe that those who vote for this law should profit by it. I think that I am sustained in the view that I take in this matter by every gentleman who served in the Mexican war. I feel perfectly sure that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], like myself, do not propose to profit by this; and yet a mere statement of that kind on record would not deprive us if hereafter we saw proper to change our minds. I thank God that I am under no necessity of applying for it.

Mr. INGALLS. I renew the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves to lay the proposed amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of section 1:

Provided, That every such officer, enlisted man, or widow, who is or may become 62 years of age, or who is or may become subject to any disability or dependency equivalent to some cause prescribed or recognized by the pension laws of the United States as sufficient reason for the allowance of a pension, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act; but it shall not be held to include any person not within the rule of age or disability or dependency herein defined, or who incurred such disability while in any manner voluntarily engaged in aiding or abetting the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

Mr. President, I do not intend to occupy much time of the Senate concerning this amendment, and will content myself with a mere statement of its purpose and effect.

The first purpose of this amendment is to prevent the establishment by the passage of this bill of the principle of mere service pension, but to require the pension to rest upon some basis of disability. I have selected the age of 62 years because that is the period at which the laws require the retirement of officers of the Navy, and consequently implies a disability to a certain extent.

The second is to require a disability of some kind, whether contracted in the service or since, that shall be equivalent in its effects to some cause recognized by the pension laws as sufficient to support the grant of a pension.

The third is a degree of dependence that shall be equivalent to that of dependent father or mother for which we grant pensions now.

That is the extent of the proviso so far as the granting of pensions is concerned, but in order to save from the operation of the act such disabilities as may have been incurred in military service opposed to the authority of the United States during the rebellion this expressly provides that for a disability of that kind the pension shall not be granted. In other words, it is proposed to grant a pension to every soldier within the terms of this act having a disability on account of the age of 62 years or any physical disability or any pecuniary dependency, but saving our pension laws from granting pensions to those who incurred disability in opposition to the authority of the United States.

For one, sir, I think it right to confine our pension system to something more than mere presence in the service, and believing that to be right and having shaped this amendment to that purpose, I am also in favor of saving it from going to the extent of granting pensions on account of disability received in the so-called confederate service. That, sir, is the purpose and extent of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. VANCE. I desire to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 1 the following proviso:

Provided, That every such officer, enlisted man, or widow, who is or may become 62 years of age, or who is or may become subject to any disability or dependency equivalent to some cause prescribed and recognized by the pension laws of the United States as a sufficient reason for the allowance of a pension, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act, but it shall not be held to include any person not within the rule of age or disability or dependency herein defined, or who incurred such disability while in any manner voluntarily engaged in aiding or abetting the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. Is it in order to offer an amendment as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment in the second degree is in order.

Mr. GEORGE. I offer the following as a substitute for that amendment:

Provided, That this act shall not apply to any such surviving officer, enlisted man, or marine who has the means of support without resorting to manual labor.

Mr. WILSON. There is one thing further I may state by way of explanation of my amendment, and that is this: So far as the disability of age is concerned it does not take into account anything that may have transpired; but any person within the terms of the act who is now 62 years of age, or who may become 62 years of age, will be entitled to the benefit of the act. Pensions will not be given for a disability contracted in the so-called confederate service.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Iowa whether his amendment does not also recognize some disability by way of dependence? However, I believe this is offered as a substitute.

Mr. INGALLS. Rising to a parliamentary inquiry, I confess that I am unable to see how, under the rules, the proposition offered by the Senator from Mississippi can be regarded as a substitute. There is nothing in our rules that recognizes a motion that one phrase or one paragraph shall be a substitute for another. The Senator from Mississippi can offer his amendment as an amendment to that proposed by the Senator from Iowa. It will then be only in the second degree, and of course can be entertained under the rules, but there is no method known to parliamentary law, so far as my observation goes, by which it can be moved as a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi had a right to offer an amendment to the pending amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. INGALLS. Unquestionably.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any limitation which forbids his offering an amendment which strikes out all the words?

Mr. INGALLS. But there is no such thing as a substitute. He can move to strike out and insert, or he can move to amend by adding this to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Striking out and inserting is in the nature of a substitute. It amounts to the same thing.

Mr. GEORGE. I inquired of the Chair whether it was in order or not to offer it as a substitute. It is the same thing precisely as moving to strike out all of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa and inserting this in lieu thereof. I see no difficulty about it. I will modify my motion in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi moves to strike out and insert. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. INGALLS. Now the question I suppose can be divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not perceive that there are two propositions in the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Under our rules a motion to strike out and insert is not divisible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would so hold.

Mr. INGALLS. But the part to be stricken out and the part to be inserted may both be amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether a motion to postpone the further consideration of this bill until the Tuesday after the first Monday in December would be in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly the motion would be in order.

Mr. MORGAN. I will make that motion. The bill has already been amended in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama moves to postpone the further consideration of the bill until the Tuesday after the first Monday in December next.

Mr. MORGAN. The pending bill has been amended in the Senate until I suppose it is hopeless to expect to have any measure on this subject become a law during the present session of Congress. Other questions also, which have no necessary connection with this bill have been brought in at this late hour in the session, doubtless because Senators have supposed, first, that it was their duty to present those questions whenever and wherever they had an opportunity to do it; and, secondly, that it might produce some possible effect on the political campaign which is now pending in the country.

The soldiers of the Mexican war belong to both parties and they reside in both sections of the Union, if there are still any sections in this Union. Upon the floor of the Senate there are some of the most gallant of the soldiers of that war, some who earned great reputation there, who are Republicans, and some who are Democrats. Your honored candidate for Vice-President, though a boy at the time, won his spurs in the battles of the Mexican war, and I am sure that the people of the United States will take as much satisfaction in complimenting him with their votes on that ground as upon almost any other ground that could be stated. The honorable Senator who sits on my right [Mr. WILLIAMS] and who retires from this body after the 4th of March, and has now no longer interest, I suppose, in merely trying to make a record of a political or personal character, won his earliest, if not his brightest, laurels upon those fields. It has always seemed to me that it was not a fair way to treat the question connected with the Mexican war service to connect it here with the present prevailing party heats and animosities. I have felt all the time since we have been debating the question here that the Mexican war soldiers did not have a fair chance upon this floor at this time.

I have been here when three votes were taken on this bill. I remember a very magnificent speech made by that great soldier, General Shields, late one afternoon upon this bill in the Senate of the United States. I remember it so well that the effect of it has never worn off from me, and this question never arises in the Senate that that man's presence does not seem a power again in this body and his eloquent tongue to begin again to speak in behalf of his comrades in that great war.

I have endeavored to try to impress as well as I could upon the Senate my view of this case, that it is a case which stands apart from all the balance of the matters relating to pensions. In my technical opinion about the subject of pensioning soldiers, I find myself in harmony with the views stated by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to-day, that there is not any actual contract or engagement between the Government and the soldier when he enters into the service that he shall have a pension at all. I put it upon the ground of a debt of gratitude, a debt due from the country to its soldiery because of their services in time of peril, and because of the years of the earlier parts of their lives that they were compelled to spend in defense of their country or in the assertion of its rights. Putting it upon that ground, I have always felt that there was some peculiar reason why the soldiers of the Mexican war had a claim upon our gratitude, and I have felt that for years past the debt was due. I have been compelled in my own mind to draw a parallel between the case of the soldiers of the Mexican war and the seamen who go abroad upon the high seas under the flag of the United States in the privateer service or in the regular armed service of the United States, and there make conquests of property and also fight the battles of their country.

The law of prize-money, which has I believe never received the disapprobation, to say the least of it, of the Congress of the United States, applies to this case if any law applies to it. If there is any precedent of law at all that applies to the case of the Mexican war service it is the law regulating prize. Our sailors are given prize-money because it stimulates individual enterprise, because when they are away from their own squadrons and from their own coasts, they are very much under their own command and they are out among foreign people and in foreign countries and they have not access to the advantages and hospitalities of home as our soldiers have had in all of the other wars we have fought.

The soldiers of the Mexican war have been put very much on the same ground. As I observed in some former remarks I had the honor to submit to the Senate, these were almost entirely young men when they went into the service. They went into a climate that was very hot, into a country that bred sickness in their ranks to a very disastrous extent, and the men who have come back to a very large degree have brought with them the seeds of disease and an infirmity of body from which they have never recovered. I could in my own experience name quite a large number of persons who have been troubled in this way. It was upon that fact that I have heretofore predicated the statement that I thought their age had been advanced at least ten years beyond that of those in the late service in the war of the rebellion or in the war of 1812, where the service rendered in a temperate climate and under circumstances where the great body of the soldiery could have some relief from the hospitalities of their own people and the abundance of their own country.

These soldiers, when they returned to us in honor and in glory, with a degree of honor and glory and renown to which even the great armies of the United States are somewhat unaccustomed, brought with them a country which has enriched us beyond all power of description, and Senators are here to-day voting upon this question from States that were a wilderness country belonging to a foreign power at the time these young men returned with this great domain to their native country. More than that, very many of the Senators on this floor were little boys about their fathers' knees at the time these soldiers were out fighting the battles of their country, which has been a good while ago, and there are some quite young men in this body yet.

Now, it does seem to me that, looking at the analogy of our own practice and our own laws, there is no just reason for our withholding from these men a pension in what is to them a really advanced stage of life, and in the face of the fact that very many of them are stricken with poverty, when by paying one dollar out of a thousand, yes, I believe one dollar out of ten thousand or it may be one hundred thousand of the actual value of the domain that they brought to us, we could make them comfortable during the remainder of their lives.

Suppose that it should ever occur in the history of the United States—and such things may occur—that we shall have occasion to send our armies to foreign countries, say across the northern border or across the narrow part of the gulf that divides us from the Carribean Islands for the purpose of waging a warfare in that country that should last two or three years, and the soldiery that we should send there should bring back to us an extent of territory somewhat equivalent to that we acquired by the Mexican treaties, and in point of value something equal to it, I think that the coming generations of the people of the United States would scarcely ever refuse to grant to those men very large bounties, and certainly not to grant them pensions when after the lapse of years they should become old and decrepit and infirm.

We can not afford to put ourselves upon that ground, and whatever of political animosity or controversy there may be between us, let us select some subject away from this in which to express it. We have plenty of opportunity for controversy, and we need not bring every question that comes before this body into political contest between each other. Can we not look this question squarely in the face like men of reason and men of grateful hearts and appreciative minds and elevated sentiments, take hold of it and decide it strictly and purely upon its own merits? I happened to make that remark the other day casually in the Senate. It went over on the telegraph lines and this morning I received a letter from one of the old soldiers of the Mexican war in which he said: "Whatever else takes place in respect to the pensioning of Mexican soldiers, let the bill stand upon its merits. I should take a great deal more of satisfaction in believing that my country had voted me $10 or $12 a month in my old age upon the merits of my service than if they had voted me a thousand dollars a month merely because I had the political influence to gain it by a majority in those bodies."

Sir, I applaud the sentiment of that man. Such a man as that when he was a youth could be relied upon to protect the honor of his country and carry its flag in triumph in foreign lands.

The American Army has never writtten a history like that which it wrote in Mexico. It is the very romance of American prowess, and there has never been a man connected prominently with the Mexican service that I have yet heard of who has not been rewarded by the gratitude of his country in his individual person whenever the people had a chance to express their voice. Look at old General Shields, how State after State took him up and placed him at the very head of their representatives in the Senate of the United States; and Franklin Pierce, and Zachary Taylor, and General Grant, and General Scott. Why, sir, the whole list of our present notables in the United States in the military service is filled up nearly with men who in their boyhood were gallant soldiers in the Mexican war service, and there is not a man of all that host to-day who will not appeal to his service in the Mexican war as being the brightest and most distinctive honor he has ever received from his country.

Now, because we have got into an attitude on this case where politics must sway it one way or the other, because the Senate, now drawing rapidly to an adjournment, is not in an attitude to consider this question calmly and sedately, as I think it should, I believe it to be my duty as a friend of the Mexican war soldier and as one who desires that this case shall be tried upon its merits and upon nothing else, to ask the Senate to postpone the consideration of this bill until the Tuesday after the first Monday of December, at 12 o'clock meridian. I therefore make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama, to postpone the further consideration of the bill until the Tuesday after the first Monday in December.

Mr. CONGER and Mr. MORGAN called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. I do not know how he would vote, but if he were here I should vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. JONAS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK]. If he were here I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

The result was announced; yeas 0, nays 57; as follows:

YEAS—0.

NAYS—57.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILLIAMS called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceed to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. GARLAND (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. If he were here I should vote "nay," and I suppose he would vote "yea."

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move the following amendment to come in at the end of section 2:

Or during the continuance of the disability for which the same shall be granted: Provided, That section 1 of this act shall not apply to any person who is receiving a pension at the rate of $8 per month or more, nor to any person receiving a pension of less than $8 a month, except for the difference between the pension now received, if less than $8 per month, and $8 per month.

That is necessary in order to prevent the granting of double pensions. This bill was passed very hurriedly through the House of Representatives on a motion to suspend the rules and pass it through the House by one vote, so that there was no opportunity whatever for amendment. Objection was made there on that account.

It is also necessary for another reason, and that is that the amendment adopted by the Senate on motion of the Senator from Iowa proposes to grant a pension for disability, so that the limitation expressed in the fore part of my proposed amendment that the pension continue during such disability is necessary.

This is the same provision which was contained in similar words in the act of 1878, known as the law granting pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812; and if it is not adopted, undoubtedly the Mexican war soldiers who served in the late war, and who are now receiving a pension, would be entitled to a pension under this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I should like to move an executive session.

Mr. MITCHELL. We might as well go through the formal amendments.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the bill will be finished to-night. I shall feel compelled to-morrow morning to call up the legislative appropriation bill. If we can finish this bill to-night I think it would forward business very much.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move to insert in section 3, line 14, after the word "other," the word "record," and in the same line, after the word "of," to insert "enlistment and," and in the same line to strike out the word "performed;" so as to read:

The loss of the certificate of discharge shall not deprive any person of the benefits of this act, but other record evidence of enlistment and service and of an honorable discharge may be deemed sufficient.

I think the amendment is necessary to protect the Government. A similar provision is in the act of 1878. Otherwise proof by parol might be given. The Commissioner of Pensions thinks this is necessary as a safeguard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the close of section 3:

Provided, That when any person has been granted a land-warrant under any act of Congress for and on account of service in the said war with Mexico, such warrant shall be prima facie evidence of service and honorable discharge; but such evidence shall not be conclusive and may be rebutted by evidence that such land-warrant was improperly granted.

That is a provision known to the existing law, and it is to simplify the proof in this case, and will greatly aid in making out these claims.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. In section 5, line 4, I propose to strike out the words "to be paid when," and insert "which shall not be demanded or received until;" so as to read:

SEC. 5. That it shall be unlawful for any attorney, claim agent, or any other person to demand or receive a fee greater than $10 for services rendered in behalf of a claimant under this act, which shall not be demanded or received until such claim is allowed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I also offer the following amendment, to be added to section 5:

And any person violating the provisions of this act shall be subject to the provisions of section 5485 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

That simply applies the existing penalty to this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to know how section 6 reads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The section will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That section 4716 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed so far as the same relates to this act or to pensioners under this act.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have an amendment to offer, but the Senator from Michigan desires to offer an amendment to the first section.

Mr. CONGER. Before the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, which is a long one, is offered, I move to strike out, in line 20 of section 1, the words which the committee recommended to strike out:

And provided further, That this act shall not apply to any person not a citizen of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now I propose amendments as additional sections to the bill, which I send to the desk.

The amendments were read, as follows:

SEC. 8. That every person specified in the several classes enumerated in section 4693 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and the amendments thereto, who served in the military or naval service, as mentioned in said section, for the period of three months during the war of the rebellion, and has an honorable discharge therefrom, and who is or shall become disabled from any cause not the result of his own gross carelessness, disreputable conduct, or vicious habits, and shall also be dependent upon his own labor for support shall, upon making due proof of the facts, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the proper authority, be placed upon the list of pensioners of the United States, and be entitled to receive a pension during the continuance of such disability at a rate proportionate to the degree thereof; and such pension shall commence at the date of filing an application therefor. The highest rate of pension granted under this section, which shall be for total incapacity to perform any manual labor, shall be $24, which is hereby made divisible upon that basis for any less degree of disability: Provided, That no person entitled to or receiving an invalid pension under existing laws, or such as may be hereafter enacted, granting pensions for disabilities contracted in the military or naval service of the United States and in line of duty, greater than that provided for herein, shall receive the benefits of this act. But any such applicant for invalid pension having an application therefor pending, or who shall hereafter file his application for such pension, may, by declaration over his own signature, at any time, elect to prosecute his said claim under this act or under the general laws; and his pension, when allowed, if prosecuted under this act, shall commence from the date of such election.

SEC. 9. That all widows or minor children of soldiers and sailors who, as such, are now receiving, under existing laws, general or special, the sum of $8 per month, by reason of the death of such soldiers and sailors in service or from a disability contracted in the military or naval service of the United States, and in line of duty, since the 4th day of March, 1861, shall, from and after this date, be entitled to and receive the rate of $12 per month in lieu of said rate of $8; and all such widows or minor children who shall hereafter be found to be entitled to the rate of $8 per month under existing laws shall be entitled to and receive the rate of $12 in lieu of said rate of $8.

SEC. 10. That if any invalid pensioner pensioned for a disability contracted in the military or naval service of the United States, and in the line of duty, has died or shall hereafter die, leaving a widow or minor children under 16 years of age, or both, at the date of the death of such pensioner, such widow and minor children shall be held to be entitled, in the order of succession named, to an original pension in their own right, under existing laws, without being required to prove that the death of such pensioner was due to his military or naval service of the United States, and shall receive the rate now allowed by law, except that such as may be found to be entitled to $8 per month under existing laws shall receive in lieu thereof $12 per month.

SEC. 11. That pension granted such widows on account of such minor children shall be continued without limit as to age, whenever it shall appear that such minors are of unsound mind or physically helpless, so as to render them incapable of earning a subsistence: Provided, That such widow retains the care, custody, and control of such minors; and in the event of the death or remarriage of such widow, or abandonment by her of such minors, then the pension and additional pension shall be continued to them in their own right, without limit as to age, during the continuance of such disability, payable to a duly constituted guardian.

SEC. 12. That in considering the claims of dependent parents the fact and cause of death and the fact that the soldier left no widow or minor children having been shown as required by law, it shall be necessary only to show by competent and sufficient evidence that such dependent parent is without other present means of comfortable support than his or her own manual labor, or the contributions of others not legally bound for his or her support; and such as may be found to be entitled to $8 a month under existing laws shall receive in lieu thereof $12 a month from the date of this act.

SEC. 13. That in all applications under the general pension laws, including this act, where it appears by record evidence that the applicant was regularly enlisted and mustered into the service, that fact shall be sufficient prima facie evidence of soundness at the time of his enlistment, but such presumption shall be subject to rebuttal by record or other competent evidence.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have no desire whatever to detain the Senate with a single remark. These amendments are important, but I think they are clearly understood and I am quite willing myself that we have a vote without debate. ["Vote!" "Vote!"]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania to add the sections just read.

Mr. SLATER called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. WALKER (when Mr. GARLAND'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. GARLAND] is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS].

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I should vote "nay" if I were not paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. JONAS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CONGER (when Mr. PALMER'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. PALMER] is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HILL. I am paired on this question with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BROWN (after having voted in the negative). I voted, forgetting at the moment that I was paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER]. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MCMILLAN. My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM. I was instructed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] either to pair him on this amendment or announce that he would vote for the amendment if he were present. In the absence of a pair I make that announcement.

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—31.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	McMillan,	Platt,
Allison,	Frye,	Mahone,	Plumb,
Blair,	Hale,	Manderson,	Riddleberger,
Bowen,	Harrison,	Miller of Cal.,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Ingalls,	Miller of N. Y.,	Sewell,

NAYS—27.

Bayard,	Farley,	Kenna,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	George,	McPherson,	Slater,
Call,	Gorman,	Maxey,	Vance,
Cockrell,	Groome,	Morgan,	Vest,
Coke,	Hampton,	Pendleton,	Walker,
Colquitt,	Jackson,	Pugh,	Williams.
Fair,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,

ABSENT—18.

Anthony,	Edmunds,	Hill,	Sabin,
Brown,	Garland,	Hoar,	Van Wyck,
Butler,	Gibson,	Jonas,	Voorhees.
Camden,	Harris,	Lamar,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hawley,	Palmer,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. One formal amendment is made necessary by the adoption of this amendment. In section 2 of the bill, line 1, after the word "under," I move to insert "section 1 of;" so as to read:

That pensions under section 1 of this act shall be at the rate of $8 per month.

Otherwise all those entitled to pension under the first section would be entitled to $8 a month, whereas they would be entitled under the latter to a disability pension according to the actual disability.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the bill as amended, say five hundred copies, be printed, and if that provision is made I shall move that the Senate adjourn. I want to see the bill as amended before I am called upon to vote for or against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to receiving at this time the motion proposed by the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope an hour will be fixed when we shall have a vote without further debate, as this has been already debated.

Mr. HARRIS. So far as I am concerned, I shall not be prepared to vote upon the bill until I see it printed as amended, and I therefore desire that the bill shall be printed with the amendments agreed to in committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think myself the request is a reasonable one if the Senator has not had an opportunity to see the amendments; but at the same time, as the debate is all exhausted and the amendments probably are all in that will be offered, I think we ought to have an agreement to have a vote on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the motion to print.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, of course at this time in the evening in this atmosphere I do not propose to debate the bill. I simply want to say, in justice to myself and on my own account, that I shall not vote for it as amended.

The State of Missouri furnished three regiments to the Mexican war. Two of them were mustered into the service and fought the battles of Bratito and Sacramento; in the latter battle General Doniphan with 1,086 men defeating 6,000 Mexicans, capturing their batteries with cavalry and giving to military history an expedition which is without a rival in ancient or modern times. Those troops marched nine hundred miles, captured Santa Fé, Socorro, and Albuquerque; took the whole of New Mexico, and while Taylor and Scott were covering the American arms with imperishable renown in one portion of Mexico they were gaining laurels equally as great and glorious upon the soil of New Mexico.

Mr. President, these men are scattered over Missouri, or the remnants of them, old, impoverished, a great many of them, and pressing me with solicitations to vote for this bill. I can not and will not vote for this bill amended as it is now.

The amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] adds $50,000,000 to the pension-roll as soon as the claims can be adjusted. Since I have been in the Senate—and I propose to speak plainly—there has been a pretense upon the part of certain Senators that they desired to pension the Mexican war soldiers. I say deliberately a pretense, because whenever this bill has come up to the issue of a passage it has been not shot down in fair and open fight and honorable parliamentary warfare, but it has been assassinated and bled to death with amendments, and the reason of it is, in my judgment, because the Mexican war was a Democratic war and fought under a Democratic administration. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] in the opening of this debate stated the animus which has prompted many Senators upon this floor, in my judgment, in regard to this whole measure when he declared that the Mexican war was waged in order to extend the area of African slavery, that it was a war of conquest; and he announced in the beginning of the debate that that was his opinion in regard to it.

Mr. President, if any war was ever waged under the instincts of blood and natural affection and the irresistible decree of manifest destiny it was that Mexican war. The area of Texas had been settled up by American citizens, and it was just as impossible to prevent Texas from becoming a part of this Union as to keep out the State of Missouri or the State of Kansas or any other State. Our people, blood of our blood and bone of our bone, had fought a war with Mexico, and had achieved their independence. There was not an American citizen, and especially in the Southern States, from whose loins these men sprang, that had not prayed for them and invoked the blessing of God upon their heroic enterprise. So soon as Texas had achieved her independence and had applied to the American Union for admission, Mexico commenced a series of insults and outrages upon American citizens that could have but one result. If the American people had then folded their arms and allowed Texas to have fought out that issue by herself they would have covered themselves with eternal and merited ignominy and disgrace. Texas was admitted as a member of the Union, and so soon as she was admitted American arms occupied the land between the Nueces and the Rio Grande.

In addition to the wrongs and outrages perpetrated upon our citizens Mexico declared war, and then there could be but one result—the arbitrament of arms. That was the cause of the Mexican war, and whatever might have been the opinion of patriotic Americans in regard to the cause of the war, there could have been, and should have been, but one course after that war was declared. It is true that the great Whig party, in which I was reared, seized upon the Mexican war as a pretense for declaring that it was waged for the Democracy to extend slavery and to add another to the list of Democratic States. Mr. Clay, the great leader of the Whig party, whom I was taught to revere and love above any mortal man, threw down the gage of battle in the Halls of Congress on this question, but after the war had been declared the great Whig families of Kentucky leaped to the front and poured out their best blood in defense of the American flag. Mr. Clay's favorite son fell fighting at the head of his regiment at Buena Vista with McKee by his side. Mr. Webster's son and Ben Hardin's son were soldiers in that war, and the immortal answer of the American general, Taylor, to Santa Anna was given to him from the lips of Thomas L. Crittenden, now on the retired-list of the United States Army, which was echoed in the words of the whole American people, "General Taylor never surrenders." Sir, the Whig party in Kentucky, in Tennessee, and in the other States of the West was true to the flag. It was not so everywhere. It was not so in Massachusetts, which furnished to the war one regiment, that commanded by Caleb Cushing, not raised in Massachusetts, but raised principally in the city of New York. Massachusetts was against the war, and I do not wonder that her Senator on this floor moved amendments to this bill with the distinct and outspoken purpose of destroying and preventing its passage.

Mr. President, we are told that this bill establishes service pensions, and that therefore it ought not to be passed as it came from the House. Were not service pensions given after fifty or forty years to the soldiers of the Revolution and the soldiers of the war of 1812? Was not the first legislation to provide for those who were disabled by wounds or by sickness in the war of the Revolution and the war of 1812; and afterward were not service pensions given to those soldiers and veterans? Why not apply the same principle now? Thirty-six years have elapsed since the close of the war with Mexico. The youngest soldier who then went in defense of his country's flag is to-day in the vicinity of 60 years of age, if not more. Why is it that we hear now this clamor against service pensions?

But we are told in some quarters that we establish a precedent and that if we vote now to give service pensions to the Mexican war veterans we shall soon be called upon to give service pensions to every man who fought in the last war between the United and the Confederate States. Mr. President, I have never doubted that the time would come when every man who bore a sword or musket in that war would receive a pension from the country. It is the legitimate consequence of our legislation; it is the logical sequence of what we have done heretofore. But is there any necessity now for this class of legislation? Do the events surrounding us call on us to give these pensions now to the soldiers of the last struggle? Nineteen years only have elapsed since the close of the war between the United and Confederate States. When seventeen years more have elapsed, and when the men who went to the front, their hearts full of enthusiasm and courage for their country, come to the age of 60 years, as have these Mexican war veterans, then, if I am here in the providence of God, I pledge myself to give them the same bounty from this Government that I propose now to give the soldiers of the war with Mexico. I never doubted that that principle would be announced. Thirty-six years have elapsed—thirty-six years instead of forty—but, as the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] said to-day, in the war with Mexico our men, unacclimated, unused to the habits of people in a tropical climate, going from the temperate zone, came back with enfeebled and weakened constitutions and have dragged out their lives in lingering disease.

Oh, Mr. President, let us understand it. The argument is with those who say that the soldiers in the war with Mexico should be pensioned, but political prejudice is against us, and the object of the Republican party now in this Senate is to put Democratic Senators in such a position by amendments to this bill that if we vote against it on account of the amendments, in the coming canvass we shall hear that we are opposed to pensioning the soldiers of the Union. Sir, I have said on this floor, and I repeat it again, the country that would not pension the men who have been disabled by shot and shell and saber-stroke in her defense, or who were enfeebled by disease contracted in her service, or who after years are found with the decrepitude of age—the country that would not pension these men ought to be blotted out from the map of Christendom. I say it again, and I have so voted, and I expect to.

I am in favor of pensioning the soldiers of the Union according to the legislation we have established as a precedent and according to the rules of justice and of gratitude; but let us apply the same rule, let us not spend time here in a political canvass at the expense of the old, decrepit, and worn-out Mexican war soldiers. But, sir, I will not establish a different rule from that established heretofore by the laws of Congress. I will not be forced to vote for the amendments that are put upon this bill, and in reply to those of my constituents who come to me with trembling limbs and in rags, perhaps, and ask my reason for this vote, I will point to the unjust and partisan legislation of the majority of this body.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, I had indulged the hope that we should pass through the discussion of a pension bill without attempting to arouse party feeling or partisan feeling, or without reference to the kind or character of wars in which these soldiers might have been engaged. We had passed almost through it until the Senator from Missouri charges upon the Repulicans of this side of the House that they make amendments here in favor of the soldiers of the war of the rebellion and discriminating to some extent against the soldiers of the Mexican war, as he says, because that was a Democratic war and the war of the rebellion was a Republican war.

Mr. VEST. I did not say that.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator said the opposition to one of the clauses of this bill in regard to Mexican war soldiers was because that was a Democratic war.

Mr. VEST. I said that.

Mr. CONGER. I say the other.

Mr. VEST. Ah! I did not say it.

Mr. CONGER. The only possible inference there can be, the only possible reason for dragging in a partisan view of this question is the contrast between a Democratic war and a Republican war; and I take occasion to call attention to it, that on this pension bill the first and only time in which partisanship has been appealed to in any of the provisions of this bill is that the Republicans are charged with opposing some of the provisions of the bill because it would favor men who were engaged in a Democratic war, stopping there, when we are endeavoring to have incorporated in this bill some provisions for those glorious men who were engaged in carrying on a Republican war; and there I am willing to let it stand before the country, the charge and the answer and the judgment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unanimous consent was given to entertain the motion made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] that five hundred copies of the bill with the amendments be printed.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to say that I want the bill printed with the amendments agreed to in italics, so that we can distinguish all the amendments agreed to in Committee of the Whole from the text of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those directions will be given if the motion be adopted. The question is on the motion.

Mr. MITCHELL. We are very anxious to get through with this bill to-night. The motion of the Senator from Tennessee contemplates laying it over until to-morrow. I hope we shall be able to come to a unanimous understanding that a vote shall be taken at a certain time to-morrow.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection myself to agreeing to take the vote without any further debate at any hour that may be named after the bill is printed with the amendments.

Mr. HARRISON. That is best, I think.

Mr. PLATT. There will be no difficulty about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. Now I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HARRISON. Before that is done——

Mr. HARRIS. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope we shall have unanimous consent——

Mr MITCHELL. I ask unanimous consent that a vote may be taken upon the bill without debate to-morrow at 1 o'clock.

Several SENATORS. Say 2.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, say 2 o'clock.

Mr. ALLISON. Unless some Senator desires to debate the question further I hope an earlier hour will be named. I desire to call up the legislative appropriation bill to-morrow.

Mr. HARRIS. Say 1 o'clock.

Mr. MITCHELL. The understanding is without debate. It will only require the time to call the roll. I will say 1 o'clock.

Mr. PLUMB. If we are to have no debate why can we not take the vote now? The Senate is as full as it will be to-morrow.

Several SENATORS. We want to see the bill in print.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks that the vote be taken on the bill at 1 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection to that proposition?

Mr. ALLISON. On the bill and amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the whole question.

Mr. MAXEY. I object to that.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then I hope Senators will remain here and insist on the passage of this bill to-night. It has been stated here repeatedly that there is a purpose on this side of the Chamber to defeat legislation which shall carry pensions to the Mexican war soldiers. For myself I deny it; for this side of the Chamber I deny it, and I know there is no such purpose in the mind of any Senator on this side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Was objection made to the understanding to have a vote at 1 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. MAXEY. There was objection made.

Several SENATORS. No objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was no objection in the hearing of the Chair.

Mr. MAXEY. I have already stated that I object, and I do it for the reason that the bill as it stands now will require some explanation of some votes at least. I propose to place myself in a position to give any explanation I think proper.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think any one will object to an explanation of a vote.

Mr. MAXEY. I have no disposition to argue the bill and have not had for ten days, because I have seen its fate clearly and unequivocally for ten days past; but I can not consent to have a vote taken until I put on record my reasons.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest then, if the vote is taken at 1 o'clock, the Senator will have an opportunity to make his explanation before 1 o'clock arrives. I hope he will not object to an hour being named, and so arranging that he will have an opportunity to make his explanation.

Mr. MAXEY. I only speak for myself. I propose to do that, and I have no doubt there are others who would like the same privilege that I claim for myself.

Mr. JONAS. If we are not to have the time to state our objections and give our reasons, we might as well vote now as when the bill shall be printed. I do not care about reading the amendments if I can not have an opportunity of explaining my views in relation to them before I cast my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objections have been made to the understanding proposed.

Mr. SEWELL. I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that the bill be taken up to-morrow after the morning business, under the five-minute rule, and that unanimous consent be given to take a vote at 2 o'clock, or not later than 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey make the proposition?

Mr. SEWELL. I ask unanimous consent to that arrangement.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object. I mean now as I have meant from the beginning of this contest to pension the Mexican war soldiers; and inasmuch as politics have been sandwiched into this little contest, I think we might as well go on with it now. I shall object to any proposition that comes up except that which a majority of the Senate can carry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia objects.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CONGER and others called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER].

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and therefore decline to vote upon my own motion.

Mr. JONAS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK].

Mr. PLUMB (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD]. If he were present, I would vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] on the bill.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. WALKER. My colleague [Mr. GARLAND] is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS].

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Beck,	George,	Lamar,	Slater,
Call,	Gorman,	Mahone,	Vance,
Cameron of Pa.,	Groome,	Maxey,	Vest,
Coke,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Walker,
Colquitt,	Jackson,	Pendleton,	Williams.
Fair,	Jones of Florida,	Pugh,
Farley,	Kenna,	Ransom,

NAYS—29.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Logan,	Platt,
Allison,	Frye,	McMillan,	Riddleberger,
Blair,	Hale,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Bowen,	Harrison,	Miller of Cal.,	Sewell,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Miller of N. Y.,	Wilson.
Conger,	Ingalls,	Mitchell,
Cullom,	Jones of Nevada,	Morrill,
Dawes,	Lapham,	Pike,

ABSENT—21.

Anthony,	Edmunds,	Jonas,	Sherman,
Bayard,	Garland,	McPherson,	Van Wyck,
Brown,	Gibson,	Palmer,	Voorhees.
Butler,	Harris,	Plumb,
Camden,	Hill,	Sabin,
Cockrell,	Hoar,	Saulsbury,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask Senators on both sides of the Chamber to come to some agreement respecting the vote on the bill. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee, that the bill ought to be printed with the amendments, is a very proper one; but if we are to finish the business of the session we must facilitate the passage of all the bills which are inevitably bound to pass. Of course this is one of them; it will pass in some form.

Now, I appeal to the Senate to take the suggestion of the Senator from New Jersey, that to-morrow morning after the usual routine business shall be over the bill shall be taken up, and under the five-minute rule, or if that is too short, I will say under the ten-minute rule, that Senators on both sides of the Chamber shall have an opportunity of debating the question until 2 o'clock, and that then voting shall begin upon the bill and amendments. If that can be done I am willing to postpone the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill for that purpose, as I see the importance of getting this bill out of the way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. MAXEY. I was one of those who made objection to the proposed agreement. I think the Senator from Iowa will bear me out, from the time of my service with him, that I am not in the habit of boring the Senate with long speeches about anything. I say what I have to say in a very few words and in strict accordance with the rules in discussing any question. But here is a measure which came from the House to the Senate for one single purpose clearly defined on the face of the bill. It seemed apparent before the 3d day of this month that the bill was to stand or fall upon its own merits. Almost every speech that had been made up to that time was in that direction. Some of the most prominent and distinguished members of the Republican party said that they desired to take up the bill and pass it as it came from the House, without amendment.

To-day an amendment which was placed upon the bill upon the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, as I can catch it, for I do not profess to understand it thoroughly, revolutionizes the whole bill. The Mexican pension bill, which was the bill brought to us, becomes insignificant as compared with the amendment which has been put on. The effect of that amendment, if I understand it correctly, may be such that gentlemen who expected to vote for the bill as it came from the House can not vote for the bill as it is now amended.

I do not care to be placed in a false position. I propose to cast my vote fearlessly and independently, but at the same time I claim the right to give the reasons for the faith that is in me. The ten-minute rule is proposed. I can say as much as I care to say in ten minutes, and I presume others can also.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I trust——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas withdraws his objection.

Mr. MAXEY. Yes, sir; I do, understanding that I can have ten minutes.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I objected to the proposition made by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Virginia will withdraw his objection.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Not just now. I shall withdraw it in a moment possibly. I hope, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia retain the floor?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Yes, sir; I merely wish to make a statement and possibly to withdraw my objection.

I was going to say that in objecting to the proposition made by the Senator from New Jersey I did so because I thought I saw on both sides of the Chamber an indisposition to vote upon the bill at any fixed hour. I have heard a great deal here about the service that these men rendered in Mexico, something about burning sands and disease and all that. It does seem to me that if there be anything in the bill it is that we propose to pension the Mexican war soldiers, and that we might remain here a few hours to pass a bill to give them that pension which they earned while they were undergoing all those hardships in Mexico.

I am opposed to anything like politics in a matter of this sort. I have voted here conscientiously for such amendments as I thought ought to be put on the bill. I have voted against such amendments as I thought ought not to be put upon the bill. Now, we have it in such a condition that all Senators who mean to pension the Mexican war soldiers can in my judgment (I will be pardoned if my judgment is faulty) vote for it. To wait until to-morrow without an agreement is simply again to say that the Senator from Iowa shall have the privilege to call up his appropriation bill, and the Mexican pension bill shall go over as it has been going over for three or four weeks.

Now, if the Senator from Iowa is willing to say that to-morrow we shall take this bill up and that it shall take precedence even of appropriation bills, I shall withdraw my objection; but I am earnestly in favor of passing this bill in the condition in which it is, to give pensions to the soldiers of the Mexican war.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from Virginia that I have already stated (perhaps he did not hear what I said) that if we could come to some agreement now about the bill so as to get it out of the way to-morrow within a reasonable time I should not urge the appropriation bill until this bill was disposed of. Therefore I suggested that we take the bill up in the morning immediately after the routine business and continue the discussion under the ten-minute rule until 2 o'clock and then have a final vote on the bill and amendments without further debate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. If that agreement can be had I am certainly ready to accept it for one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has heard the proposition made by the Senator from Iowa. Is there objection?

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator state it again? I do not know that I understand it.

Mr. ALLISON. That immediately after the routine business to-morrow morning we shall proceed to the consideration of this bill, allowing ten minutes' debate to each Senator who desires until 2 o'clock, and that then we proceed to vote on the bill and amendments without further debate.

Mr. MORGAN. That is, allowing a consideration of amendments to the bill in the morning?

Mr. ALLISON. Immediately, I should say, after the routine business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposition made by the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. MORGAN. I think that in consideration of the other public business that has to be performed before Congress adjourns we had better make that arrangement, but I do it under protest. The bill as it now stands has not been considered by any committee. The Senate has not had any opportunity to discuss it. I do not even understand the amendment. I heard it read at the desk, but my hearing is not quite accurate enough to catch everything in a bill, and I do not know all the features of this measure. It seems to be a political movement, and I suppose it is intended to be nothing else but a political movement.

I should be glad that the Senate would take even a longer time than has been proposed to consider it; but inasmuch as we must close this session of Congress very soon, inasmuch as we owe that to the country, I believe, as a principle of duty, and inasmuch as the Senate have voted down my proposition to postpone the consideration of the bill until December, so as to make way for other important legislation, I shall consent to the proposition, the understanding being that we shall commence the morning to offer and debate amendments at the close of the routine morning business.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, I speak of the routine business, as presenting petitions, &c.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand.

Mr. ALLISON. And reports of committees without debate.

Mr. MORGAN. And that we close debate on the bill and amendments at 3 o'clock.

Mr. ALLISON. At 2 o'clock I stated.

Mr. MORGAN. Did you say 2?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. I thought the Senator said 3. I hope the Senator will enlarge the time until 3 o'clock.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I will say 3 o'clock. I will give Senators further opportunity for debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa modifies the proposition. Is the proposition understood, that immediately after the routine morning business to-morrow this bill shall be taken up; that ten minutes be allowed to each Senator, and that at 3 o'clock the debate shall be closed, and that the voting shall begin on the amendments and the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Without debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without debate after 3 o'clock. The Chair hears no objection to that understanding.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 23, 1884.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

SPANISH GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, referring to publications of the senate of Spain presented to the House of Representatives; also, transmitting a note from the minister of His Majesty the King of Spain in relation to the exchange of publications of the two Governments; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

CROATAN LIGHT-HOUSE, NORTH CAROLINA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Light-House Board concerning the removal of the Croatan light-house, North Carolina, to Eightfoot Knoll, and recommending an appropriation therefor at the present session; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

WATER SUPPLY, WASHINGTON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General, recommending an extension of the period in which claimants under the act of July 15, 1882, chapter 294, providing for an increase of the water supply in Washington, may sue for damages in the Court of Claims; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. NICHOLS, on account of sickness.

J. R. HASKELL.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was granted leave to have printed the petition and papers in the case of J. R. Haskell, for the use of the committee.

BUSINESS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. ROSECRANS. By direction of the Committee on Military Affairs I present and ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on the evenings of the first and second days after the passage of the sundry civil bill the House shall take a recess at 5 o'clock, to reassemble at 8 o'clock for the sole purpose of considering bills from the Committee on Military Affairs and Senate bills on the Speaker's table the subjects-matter of which have been considered by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the bills to be considered will be named.

Mr. DUNN. What length of time is this order proposed to continue?

Mr. ROSECRANS. For two evenings only.

Mr. THOMPSON. I object.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the regular order.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions. Under this call resolutions and memorials of State and Territorial Legislatures are in order for reference; also resolutions of inquiry addressed to the heads of Departments.

FISHERIES ON ATLANTIC COAST.

Mr. KEAN introduced a bill (H. R. 7396) for the protection of fisheries on the Atlantic coast; which was read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. To what committee does the gentleman desire this bill referred?

Mr. KEAN. The bill is a copy of a bill originally introduced in the Senate. It was there referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and afterward, when the Committee on Fish and Fisheries was appointed, to that committee. I suppose it should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Does it in any way affect the relations between the United States and any foreign nation?

Mr. KEAN. That is what it is supposed to do.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM B. HARTLEY.

Mr. HARDY introduced a bill (H. R. 7397) for the relief of William B. Hartley; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Select Committee on Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, and ordered to be printed.

THOMAS F. PURNELL.

Mr. HANCOCK introduced a bill (H. R. 7411) for the relief of Thomas F. Purnell, of Austin, Tex.; which was read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House this bill should go to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HANCOCK. It relates to matters connected with the Department of Justice, and I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was accordingly referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

FUNDING UNITED STATES DEBT.

Mr. HANCOCK also introduced a bill (H. R. 7412) to authorize the funding of the entire bonded debt of the United States in 2 per cent. fifty-year bonds, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BELFORD. I call for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read at length.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Some time subsequently

Mr. BELFORD asked and obtained unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The bill is as follows:

A bill to authorize the funding of the entire bonded debt of the United States in fifty-year 2 per cent. bonds, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to receive at the Department of the Treasury of the United States, from time to time as they may be presented, any interest-bearing bonds of the United States outstanding at the date of the passage of this act, and to issue in exchange therefor an equal amount in bonds of the United States bearing interest at the rate of 2 per cent. per annum, payable on the 1st day of January, April, July, and October of each year; the bonds so issued to be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, and from taxation in any form by or under State or municipal authority, and to be and become due and payable fifty years from and after the date of their issue: Provided, That there shall be set apart from the revenues of the Government and annually applied to the purchase of said bonds a sum equal to one-half of 1 per cent. of the amount of such bonds shown by the monthly statement of the public debt of the United States issued by the Department of the Treasury on the 1st day of July of each year to be outstanding on that day, together with an amount equal to the interest annually accruing thereon; the whole amount represented by the bonds so purchased to constitute a sinking fund in the Treasury of the United States to be set apart for the final redemption of the bonds issued by authority of this act when the same shall become due and payable: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize any increase of the bonded indebtedness of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the Treasurer of the United States shall be, and hereby is, constituted commissioner of the sinking fund thus created, whose duty it shall be, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, to supervise and control the purchase of said bonds in the manner and to the extent herein authorized, and to keep a correct and detailed record of each purchase, and annually report the result of his operations to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall transmit the same to Congress.

SEC. 3. That authority to carry the provisions of this act into effect, by such regulations and forms as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 4. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

RILEY H. SMITH.

Mr. GOFF introduced a bill (H. R. 7413) for the relief of Riley H. Smith; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The call of States and Territories was then resumed and concluded.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of States and Territories. If there is no objection, the Chair will recognize gentlemen who were not in their seats when their States were called for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference.

There was no objection.

WILLIAM MOSS.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, introduced a bill (H. R. 7414) for the relief of William Moss; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

JABEZ CHAMBERLAIN.

Mr. PEEL introduced a bill (H. R. 7415) for the relief of Jabez Chamberlain; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ELLEN CHABOT.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas (by request), introduced a bill (H. R. 7416) for the relief of Ellen Chabot; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

STEPHEN SAUER.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, also introduced a bill (H. R. 7417) for the relief of Stephen Sauer; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MARIA SPILLEN.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, also introduced a bill (H. R. 7418) for the relief of Maria Spillen; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

THOMAS O. ROBINSON.

Mr. CONNOLLY introduced a bill (H. R. 7419) granting a pension to Thomas O. Robinson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE OVER THE CUMBERLAND RIVER.

Mr. McMILLIN introduced a bill (H. R. 7420) to give the assent of Congress to the construction of a railroad bridge by the Cincinnati, Green River and Nashville Railroad Company over the Cumberland River; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

J. C. AND R. L. YUILLE.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama, introduced a bill (H. R. 7421) for the relief of J. C. and R. L. Yuille, of Mobile, Ala.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ALEXANDER HALL.

Mr. RIGGS introduced a bill (H. R. 7422) to increase the pension of Alexander Hall; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL D. HARPER.

Mr. HEPBURN introduced a bill (H. R. 7423) for the relief of Samuel D. Harper, of Humiston, Iowa, late private Company K, Thirtieth Ohio Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM SEAMANS.

Mr. HANBACK introduced a bill (H. R. 7424) for the relief of William Seamans; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN R. FARRELL.

Mr. COLLINS introduced a bill (H. R. 7425) for the relief of John R. Farrell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ECLECTIC INSTITUTE AND SANITARIUM.

Mr. MOULTON (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. 7426) to incorporate the National Eclectic Institute and Sanitarium of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by a unanimous vote of the Committee on Appropriations to ask to suspend the rules and pass, after reading and a debate of fifteen minutes on each side, the sundry civil appropriation bill; but I have been directed by the committee to allow to be offered some seven amendments, the principal being that reported, as we are advised, by the unanimous vote of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, relating to the pay of district attorneys, assistant district attorneys, marshals, clerks of courts, and incidental expenses in relation to carrying on judicial proceedings in the Federal courts.

Another amendment which I desire to submit to a vote of this House is in relation to payment to the heirs of Mr. Herron, of Louisiana, and Mr. Updegraff, of Ohio, formerly members of this House.

Another amendment provides for one month's extra pay to the House employés—the same provision which has been adopted in the sundry civil appropriation bill for three years past.

Another amendment is in relation to the authority asked by the Secretary of War to sell certain arsenals now of no use, and to cover the money received therefor into the Treasury of the United States.

Another amendment is to pay Mr. Courts, clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, for services rendered to a commission created by law to make examination with a view to the equalization of the salaries of Senate and House employés.

I believe the other two amendments are clerical. I will only add that there is printed in the bill a proposition that hereafter no speeches not delivered shall be printed in the RECORD. The committee, deeming that this provision would cause objection to the motion which, as I have said, I submit by the unanimous voice of the committee, have agreed to strike that provision from the bill.

Mr. BELFORD. I give notice to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that I desire to move an amendment to the section of this bill relating to miscellaneous objects, so as to appropriate $500,000 to the construction and maintenance of a home for disabled soldiers of the confederate army. Does the gentleman intend to allow me to offer that amendment?

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman submitted that proposition to the House and it was referred to the committee. It is not inserted in this bill.

Mr. BELFORD. What bill can you put it in, except this?

Mr. RANDALL. That will be a matter for the House to determine.

Mr. BELFORD. What did the gentleman say?

Mr. RANDALL. I say the way to accomplish the gentleman's object is for the House to determine.

Mr. BELFORD. Very well. I desire to offer this amendment. I am a Republican. I have made this proposition in the interest of the South. You have 72 Democratic majority; and you are afraid to consider it. I object to unanimous consent.

Several MEMBERS (to Mr. BELFORD). Withdraw your objection.

Mr. BELFORD. No; I will not. I will stand and fight this matter for a month.

Mr. RANDALL. Do I understand the gentleman from Colorado to object to this motion, made under the unanimous instruction of the Committee on Appropriations?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the last remark of the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. BELFORD. I have simply asked for the consideration of a proposition coming from a Northern and Western Republican which Southern Democrats are afraid to consider. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not rise for the purpose of making objection; but on page 45 of this bill there is a provision in reference to the Tenth Census, proposing to close up the whole census business with an appropriation of $10,000. I am satisfied, from authentic documents which I have in my possession, that this sum ought to be increased. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make this matter an exception, so that I may offer an amendment to this part of the bill and state to the House my reasons for it.

Mr. RANDALL. Individually I favor the proposition of the gentleman from New York; but I have no instructions from the committee to admit such an amendment. I will say, however, since the gentleman from New York has stated he does not mean to make any objection to this motion, that I will co-operate with him, so far as I may be able, to secure before the final passage of this bill the legislation which he seeks.

Mr. KEIFER. Before this matter is finally submitted to the House, some members of the committee on this side desire to make some suggestions in reference to it. While we assent so far as we individually can to the arrangement that unanimous consent be given for the purpose of suspending the rules and passing this bill, reserving the right to submit certain amendments as stated by the chairman of the committee, we wish it distinctly understood that the amendment relating to salaries of United States marshals and district attorneys is to be considered subject to amendment, subject to discussion, and subject to points of order, as if it were considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Now, that is as far as I desire to make any statement.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say in reply——

Mr. KEIFER. I hope unanimous consent will be given.

Mr. RANDALL. My understanding of the recommendation of the committee in regard to the amendment to which the gentleman refers is that it shall be open to discussion and amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. And to points of order.

Mr. RANDALL. And to points of order as well.

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; it is with that understanding.

Mr. RANDALL. That it shall be considered in the House on these amendments as in Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. CANNON. As one of the minority members of the Committee on Appropriations I reluctantly gave my consent to the proposition which is submitted to the House, namely, that unanimous consent shall be given to move to suspend the rules and pass this bill with the exceptions named. I say I reluctantly gave my consent after the lapse of nearly seven months since the Congess convened, which time has been frittered and wasted in my opinion—time in which this bill could and should have been reported and considered under the rules in the ordinary manner.

Mr. RANDALL. If it is important I should hear what the gentleman from Illinois is saying I only want to say that I have not heard a word of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is important that every member on the floor should hear what is said when public matters are under consideration, and he will endeavor to secure order for that purpose. Gentlemen will resume their seats and stop conversation.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to know whether this debate is in order?

The SPEAKER. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I give notice if there is to be political debate indulged in on this matter I shall object to it.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope gentlemen will not bring politics into this matter.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is why I am objecting to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands an effort is being made on the floor to harmonize the views of gentlemen so the motion indicated may be submitted.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to submit a remark or two, Mr. Speaker, in explanation or excuse of my concurrence with the view of the Committee on Appropriations in asking unanimous consent. I was proceeding to say that nearly seven months had elapsed since the convening of this Congress, in which, in my opinion, this bill ought to have been reported and considered under the rules of the House and passed. Nevertheless it has not been, and we have now reached the 23d day of June. Members, I believe, on both sides, so far as I have been informed, are desirous of adjourning, and it is feared, and perhaps with considerable reason, that if this bill is to be considered in Committee of the Whole under the rule, open to amendment and discussion, it will throw the adjournment beyond the 3d or 4th day of July. I must say I have myself some fear that would be the case.

I wish to say further, in many respects, in my opinion, the bill is a good one. In some respects I think it is not. I believe in some respects it ought to be amended. But I have been willing under the circumstances to give my consent to the proposition, hoping it would bring about a speedy adjournment, and trusting elsewhere the bill might receive amendments which are proper.

Mr. RANDALL. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois I want to say that this bill contains items requiring great research and study, and that I have, and I think the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations have, given four months of close consideration and study to the subject. It is an omnium gatherum bill, and necessarily comes in toward the end of a session. Let me further remind the gentleman from Illinois that in the first session of the last Congress this bill was not presented until the expiration of the fiscal year; in other words, it did not come here until after the 30th June, 1883, and that we were therefore compelled to pass a general bill continuing the appropriations beyond the date of the expiration of the then expiring fiscal year. So that the gentleman readily sees we have been perplexed not to the same extent they were perplexed, but to the extent that has prevented an earlier reporting of this bill.

But I rose principally to correct any impression that might be inferred from the gentleman's remark that this bill had not full consideration in the committee. On the contrary, sir, it has had the fullest consideration and study, and I do not think I am transgressing the rule when I say I have not heard to the contrary on the part of any member of this committee but this was a fair, reasonable, and just bill in the purposes and amounts given for the objects included in it.

Mr. BELFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania one question, whether he will allow me to offer the amendment that I have suggested to this bill?

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, as one of the subcommittee who participated in the preparation of this bill I concur in the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that the subcommittee did devote a great deal of time, attention, and thought to this bill in its preparation. In the main I regard the bill as a reasonably fair one.

There are some things not provided for which I could wish were provided for. There are some appropriations for certain objects which I regard as insufficient for the purposes contemplated. But on the whole, after careful consideration of it, and in view of the almost unanimous desire, I believe, on both sides of the House, and undoubtedly of the entire country, for an early adjournment of this session of Congress, I thought it better that the minority should give its assent to the suggestion of the majority of the committee and allow this bill to be passed in the manner proposed, under the suspension of the rules.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I concur in the main with the remarks made by the gentleman from Kansas, who has just taken his seat, as to this bill, that it is a reasonably fair bill. I differ with him only in this respect, that I think there are some provisions in the bill that ought not to be in it, while my friend thinks there are some omissions that should be supplied. I do not agree with him in that respect, and think there are provisions in it that would even be subject to the point of order.

There are many reasons why the bill should be disposed of at the earliest possible moment, but with the understanding that the seven amendments named by the chairman of the committee shall be allowed to be acted upon separately, to be open for debate and amendment and subject to the point of order, as I understand to be the pending proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It occurs to me that the better policy is to take the course proposed by him in conformity with the views of the committee.

But, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state in this respect that I am controlled in my action in the matter of not giving this bill in Committee of the Whole more thorough and searching examination, by the fact that I hope the House will have the necessary time to take action upon the important series of measures reported from the Committee on the Public Lands; and I hope now the House will not wish to adjourn without ample time to consider fully and mature the legislation suggested. In view, therefore, of the fact that if the time fixed for adjournment is to be concurred in, I have agreed to the action proposed here, so that the important measures to which I have referred may have ample time for consideration, which I hope the House will devote to them.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to object to or interfere with the proposition recommended by the Committee on Appropriations whether the proposition I have now to submit be accepted or not. But I ask unanimous consent of the committee and of the House to be allowed to offer, on the same conditions that the other amendments are proposed, the amendment I now send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the proposition for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall apply the surplus revenues at any time in the Treasury in excess of $100,000,000, not otherwise appropriated, to the redemption of United States bonds; and when any of said bonds are redeemable at the pleasure of the Government it shall not be lawful to apply any portion of said surplus to the purchase of bonds at a premium.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Appropriations did not consider this matter, not having had it before then. But I join the gentleman from Illinois in asking the House, and I do this of course not under instructions from the committee, but none the less heartily, that unanimous consent may be given to have a vote upon this proposition subject to the point of order and the other conditions which apply to the amendment before suggested.

Mr. CHASE. The point of order being still reserved?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HISCOCK. Not having clearly understood the amendment from the reading, I therefore object for the present. Possibly later in the day, after an examination of the subject, I may withdraw the objection; but I desire for the present to be understood as interposing an objection.

Mr. WELLER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLER. Will it be proper for me at this time to suggest that I am heartily in accord with that proposition? [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I certainly have no desire to play the rôle of obstructionist. I recognize, in common with gentlemen on both sides of the House, the necessity of an early adjournment of this session.

But let us see what is proposed to be done here. We have presented a bill of some 2,000 lines appropriating $21,000,000 in round numbers. Of its contents the House has not been advised. The Committee on Appropriations under the rule bring in their bill, and although there may be an overwhelming majority of the House disposed to increase the appropriations, it can not be done. Practically the Committee on Appropriations are absolute in determining for what public purposes appropriations shall be made and how much shall be made.

They not only formulate the bill, but they bring it into the House and say to us, "We propose to ask the House that the question of amendment shall be wholly confined to the Committee on Appropriations; we not only ask you to take the bill so far as the committee have framed it, but all amendments that are to be offered to it are simply those which the chairman of the committee holds in his hand and which have been suggested by the committee itself." Now, if we are to take the work of the committee and are to be confined in these amendments to the will of the committee, I think we had better adopt the resolution which is usually accepted by political conventions—send this bill again to the Committee on Appropriations with all the amendments that are suggested to it without debate, and when they have completed their work let them bring the bill here and I will vote for it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana object to the request which has been made?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I shall not under the circumstances object, but I desire to enter my protest against this kind of legislation, this thing of putting upon passage in the House of Representatives the mere work of a committee without any opportunity to have the bill read or to hear the various items discussed.

Mr. RANDALL. The bill will be read. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill, allowing fifteen minutes debate on each side, and allowing the amendments he has indicated to be offered and voted on in the House. As to the amendment to be proposed as the Chair understands by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, it is to be subject to points of order and open to amendment and discussion.

Mr. HOLMAN. Each of the amendments.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand I was recognized as objecting to the proposition offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON].

The SPEAKER. Yes; that is not before the House.

Mr. CHACE. I desire to inquire if it is understood that all amendments are to be subject to points of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say points of order might be made against the amendment proposed in relation to the fees and salaries of marshals, commissioners of United States courts, &c.

Mr. RANDALL. And other amendments.

The SPEAKER. That will be the understanding.

Mr. KEIFER. That there may be no misunderstanding, I wish to state how I understand this agreement. This substitute for a portion of the bill proposed by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice is, as I understand, to be considered as an amendment, but considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL. In the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KEIFER. In the House as in Committee of the Whole, subject to points of order.

Mr. RANDALL. And amendment.

The SPEAKER. That was the understanding of the Chair. There being no objection the motion will be considered as seconded, and there will be thirty minutes allowed for debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill be read.

Mr. RANDALL. That is part of the motion, that the bill be read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the rules will be considered as suspended, and the bill is now before the House under the arrangement proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that there shall be thirty minutes of debate on the bill, fifteen minutes for and fifteen against, after which the amendments will be considered.

Mr. RANDALL. I now ask that the bill be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania (interrupting the reading). Inasmuch as it will take fully an hour to read this bill I ask unanimous consent be given that the reading be dispensed with.

Mr. POLAND. I understand this is to be the only reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COX, of New York). It will be the only reading of the bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I object to the reading of the bill being dispensed with.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill. When he had read the paragraphs relating to the Government Hospital for the Insane,

Mr. BELFORD said: I desire to inquire if an amendment at this time is in order—an amendment to come in at the end of the paragraphs just read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP). An amendment is not in order at this time. The bill will be read through, after which there will be allowed fifteen minutes of debate on each side.

Mr. BELFORD. I heard it announced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that certain amendments should be considered. I desire to offer my amendment at the end of the paragraph which has just been read. If it is not in order now, I wish to inquire when it will be in order, if in order at all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order at this time. The bill will be read through.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill. When he had read the following paragraph, on page 62,

To purchase additional grounds at or near Philadelphia, Pa., for a national cemetery, $15,000,

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, said: I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a question in regard to this item.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Missouri that nothing is in order at this time except the reading of the bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Is it not in order to ask a question for information?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not at this time. After the reading of the bill is completed there will be allowed fifteen minutes for debate on each side, and then the information which the gentleman desires can be elicited.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I wanted to ask the chairman if this item providing for the appropriation of money for purchase of ground for cemetery purposes in his own city is not new legislation and not in the line of retrenchment, the points raised by him that excluded the items from the deficiency bill for street improvements around public buildings at Saint Louis. An objection would have excluded this, but I will not make it.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill. When he had read the following paragraph, on page 83,

And no speech or portion of a speech or remarks shall be printed in the RECORD that shall not have been delivered upon the floor of Congress in open session,

Mr. RYAN said: I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the provision which has just been read, that no speech or remarks shall be printed in the RECORD that have not been delievered upon the floor of Congress. I understood that that was stricken out of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. After the reading of the bill is completed I will move to amend it in that particular.

The SPEAKER. The bill is being read as reported by the Committee on Appropriations. The proposed amendments will be disposed of afterward.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 6526) making an appropriation for the completion of the sewerage system of the District of Columbia.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7380) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Under the agreement made by unanimous consent there is to be allowed thirty minutes for debate upon this bill, fifteen minutes to be occupied by those who desire to speak in support of the bill and fifteen minutes by those who desire to oppose the bill, after which the amendments will be considered in their order.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to submit a request in reference to a clause to be found on page 77 of this bill, which reads thus:

That hereafter the Public Printer is required to print not more than one volume each year of the decisions and opinions of the First Comptroller of the Treasury Department, with such explanatory matter as he may furnish, and to furnish to him not more than one hundred copies of each volume.

I desire to say that that clause is in exact accordance with the present law so far as it authorizes the printing of one volume each year, and it in no sense changes the present law except that it gives to the First Comptroller of the Treasury one hundred copies to be distributed by him. It does not reduce the number to be printed, and leaves 1,900 copies undisposed of. I wish to ask unanimous consent to strike that whole clause out of the bill, because it does not reduce the number to be printed, and as I have said does not change the existing law in any respect except that it gives the First Comptroller of the Treasury one hundred copies of each volume.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. KEIFER. I think the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], who drew this clause will agree with me.

Mr. HOLMAN. The intention is not to print more than 100 copies.

Mr. RANDALL. And that is what this accomplishes. The original act provides for printing 9,000 copies. This proposes to continue the printing to the extent of 100 copies only. Another clause at the end of the paragraph in relation to public printing repeals all laws inconsistent with this bill.

Mr. KEIFER. Undoubtedly, so far as they are inconsistent.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman wants to make it any plainer——

Mr. KEIFER. We either ought to provide specifically that a certain number only shall be printed or we ought to strike out this entire paragraph.

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing that unanimous consent be given to insert a proviso that there shall be printed only 100 copies, to be given to the First Comptroller of the Treasury.

Mr. KEIFER. Under the present law each member of Congress is entitled to 14 copies for distribution. This paragraph does not change the law in that respect, and I do not want to change it. I do not, however, see the necessity of putting this clause in the bill and allowing 9,000 copies to be printed, and leaving 1,900 copies undisposed of.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. The intention of the committee was to limit the publication to 100 copies of each volume, and one volume per year, the 100 copies to be for the use of the Treasury officials, to be distributed by the First Comptroller himself. The intention of the committee was not to publish any more than that number.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman will agree with me that this does not affect the number to be printed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am stating now what was the purpose of the committee, which was to limit the number to 100 copies, for the use of Treasury officials.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman will agree that that is not accomplished by this clause, will he not?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am afraid it is not.

Mr. RANDALL. I think it is; but still I am willing to make it plainer, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] or the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will suggest words to make it so.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not consent that the limitation of the number shall be 100 copies in all. I thought it best to have the whole clause go out by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I shall object to that. I can see no reason for printing 9,000 copies of that book.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is of no value in the world.

Mr. RANDALL. If any gentleman wants the fifteen minutes in opposition to this bill I am now ready to yield. I do not desire to occupy any time now myself in the advocacy of the bill. [After a pause.] No one seeking the floor, I will submit an amendment.

Mr. COX, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me two minutes?

Mr. RYAN. I desire to know what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] proposes to do with his time?

Mr. RANDALL. I will yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN], to be disposed of as he sees fit.

Mr. CHACE. Is that the fifteen minutes in advocacy of this bill which was to be controlled by the other side?

Mr. RANDALL. There is no "other side" on this bill.

Mr. RYAN. I will yield five minutes of the time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] yields fifteen minutes of time in support of the bill to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN]. I suppose those who desire to oppose the bill will be entitled to the rest of the time allowed for debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands, according to the arrangement made by unanimous consent this morning, and which was announced by the Chair, that fifteen minutes' time is to be allowed to those who desire to support the bill and fifteen minutes to those who desire to oppose it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as I understand, yields fifteen minutes in support of the bill to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is hard to arrive at a distinction in this matter. I have yielded fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Kansas as the minority member of the subcommittee. Of course the other fifteen minutes I shall control in my own right.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the fifteen minutes now to be occupied exhaust the time for discussion on this bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is not in accordance with the understanding.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir, and it is not to be executed in that way. If there be gentlemen here who want to occupy fifteen minutes in opposition to the bill, it is not my purpose to deprive them of the opportunity.

Mr. RYAN. I yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire in the five minutes yielded to me by the gentleman from Kansas to give the reasons why I objected to the consideration of the amendment the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] sought to offer to this bill. As I understand we have in the Treasury unappropriated about $150,000,000. Of this sum $75,000,000 or $80,000,000 is silver. The result of the gentleman's amendment would be immediately to force from the Treasury in gold all the available funds in excess of $100,000,000, leaving there—the bonds are to be redeemed in gold—$75,000,000 or $80,000,000 silver and $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 in gold Under the operation of the amendment, as gold and silver come into the Treasury the gold will be forced out to redeem the bonds and into the hands of the bondholders, leaving only the silver remaining. To that I am opposed, and that is one of the grounds of my objection.

Another objection is, that under the provisions of the gentleman's amendment this excess above $100,000,000 must be used in retiring 3 per cent. bonds, thereby striking at the basis of the national-bank circulation and the national-bank system. If, in carrying out such a measure, money were to be saved by the Government, I could not perhaps defend this objection, but so far as concerns all the bonds which are the basis of the circulation of the national banks, the interest to the Government is only 2.10 per cent. Under the phraseology of the amendment redemption must take place and no purchases can be made, though, as I understand at the rates at which other bonds are sold in the market to-day, the Government can buy them and save interest at the rate of 2½ per cent. While there might be this saving on the part of the Government by purchasing bonds rather than redeeming them, yet for some reason, which I do not understand, redemption is to be forced.

Mr. MORRISON. The gentleman will allow me a moment. I was not in my seat when he commenced his remarks——

Mr. HISCOCK. I have but five minutes.

Mr. MORRISON. I desire to know whether the gentleman has withdrawn his objection?

Mr. HISCOCK. I have not.

Mr. MORRISON. Then I must object to this debate. The amendment is not before the House.

Mr. HISCOCK. The latitude allowed in the consideration of general appropriation bills permits the statement which I am making. This bill is being discussed as in Commitee of the Whole, and I hope this interruption will not be taken out of my time.

Mr. MORRISON. By reason of the gentleman's objection the amendment is not before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] has expired.

Mr. CHACE. I submit that this interruption should not come out of the gentleman's time. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] has occupied the time of the gentleman from New York with a matter extraneous to the question before the House and not introduced by the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The interruption occupied half a minute.

Mr. HISCOCK. Do I understand the Chair to say that I have occupied five minutes?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. HISCOCK. I never knew time to fly so swiftly. [Laughter.] If the gentleman from Kansas will give me one minute more? I desire only to say that I am most emphatically opposed to considering legislation which may be so serious in its consequences in the form of a rider upon a general appropriation bill, to receive only scanty consideration coming here in this manner at this late day in the session, and so far as I know without having been submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury or having been considered by a committee. In the amounts of money I have stated I have not the figures before me, but I doubt not I have closely approximated to correct amounts. I believe the effect of the gentleman's amendment will be a forced retirement of national-bank currency, and this is not the time to give the country experimental legislation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MORRISON. I desire to say a word or two in reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. RANDALL. I yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON].

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I was not in my seat when the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] commenced his remarks, and have heard but little of what he has said with reference to the amendment which I proposed and was prevented from making because of his objection. From what I did hear of what he said I am led to believe that he misapprehends the purpose of the proposed amendment. Its object is simply to reach the surplus in the Treasury.

The reply to the House or statement recently made by the Secretary of the Treasury shows that there was then, March 5, money in the Treasury amounting to $498,735,509.14. A part of this sum is held for the redemption of the notes of national banks which have failed or for which the Government is otherwise liable. Other large sums are in the Treasury for specific purposes, and all these go to make up the aggregate amount stated and are to be deducted from this aggregate to ascertain the surplus. When so deducted the surplus is found to be about $150,000,000. This sum is unappropriated and is not held for any trust or for any specific object. The only legitimate purpose for which it is now kept in the Treasury is for the redemption or payment of Treasury notes which may be presented for payment.

To create this surplus or reserve fund it will be remembered by those who have given attention to the subject the then Secretary sold bonds amounting to $95,000,000, some bearing interest as high as 5 per cent., and this sum has been since increased from the current revenues to about $150,000,000. It was first called a resumption fund, then a reserve fund, and now surplus.

In conversation with the Secretary of the Treasury but a few days since he stated the sum then in the Treasury for this purpose or subject to this use to be $147,000,000. This amendment, Mr. Speaker, enacted into law, will declare that this is $47,000,000 too much; that $100,000,000 in the Treasury is entirely sufficient, and more than sufficient, to answer the purpose, especially when we remember that lying behind this sum is authority vested in the Secretary of the Treasury to sell bonds bearing as high rate as 5 per cent. interest to obtain money to redeem these notes at any time when the money found in the Treasury is not sufficient. With such power and authority to use the credit of the Government vested in the Secretary of the Treasury $100,000,000 is ample. It is more than sufficient, but out of abundant caution I do not propose to go below that sum.

The gentleman from New York rests his objection to the amendment proposed by me in part upon its alleged interference with the rights, privileges, or franchises of the national banks. The amendment has no such purposes and is not aimed at the banks. Its purpose is to take from the Treasury nearly $50,000,000 held there for no necessary purpose and under no other law than the discretion of the Secretary, and apply it to the redemption of interest-bearing bonds. It is offered in the belief that all the money in the Treasury not appropriated to or held for any specific use or purpose in excess of $100,000,000 for a reserve redemption or resumption fund is not needed in the Treasury, and should be applied in the payment of our bonded debt, that $1,500,000 may be saved in interest.

The amendment I offer to make has another purpose, which is to make it unlawful for the financial officer of the Government to go into the market and buy at a high premium bonds not yet payable while there are still outstanding interest-bearing bonds of the Government which it has the right to redeem at par. We have now outstanding more than $200,000,000 of 3 per cent. bonds which the Government has the right or option to pay without premium.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the sole purposes of the amendment I ask to be allowed to make. It applies to the public debt and is not offered with a view of affecting the banks—that is another question or subject to be considered and treated by itself. Of course I understand that when the 3 per cent. bonds are paid off or redeemed other bonds of which $1,000,000,000 will be still unredeemed must be used as a basis for banking, and this may in some degree affect some banks but not the banking system. We can not afford to tax our people that money may go into the Treasury and then keep it there to increase the profits of the banks or of individuals while by paying it out we may reduce our interest expenditure and increase our savings.

Mr. DINGLEY. I should like to put an inquiry to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MORRISON. I have no objection, if my time has not expired.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I entirely agree with him. The present Secretary of the Treasury has had the power to do what this amendment prohibits; that is, to go into the market and buy bonds at a premium, but he has not done it. He has instead redeemed the public debt wherever it could be done, and his conduct in that regard is the strongest approval of the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman's time has not expired, allow me to make a single inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope I will be permitted to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MORRISON. I do not object if I am allowed to yield for that purpose.

Mr. RYAN. I now yield two minutes to the gentlemen from New York [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up much time beyond asking to have printed something in relation to the clause as to the census on page 45 of this bill. It seems to have been the idea of the Committee on Appropriations to wind up the census business with $10,000. By some misadventure of this committee they were not in full possession of the subject. I am glad to say from the promise of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that under other conditions he will assist to have this business wound up wisely and according to existing law.

Now, sir, this census has cost less than was expected. The appropriations up to the beginning of the next fiscal year are only $5,000,000. It will be shown by the papers I present with these brief remarks that it is the cheapest census ever taken in this country. It is cheaper than the one of the preceding decade.

If the $10,000 only be appropriated it will hardly pay for the salaries of the superintendent and the chief clerk and the little rent and other miscellanies which may be required.

We have only printed thus far seven of the large quartos of 1,000 pages each and the compendium. The eighth volume is now in the hands of the Printer and stereotyped. The ninth is all composed, and there are others to be printed and almost ready. We know what is done or to be done under the bill we passed here and now before the Senate.

All will be finished by the 1st day of October, and we must have to do that an adequate sum, which I hope will be provided in an amendment in accordance with the suggestions contained in letters which I will append:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., June 21, 1884.

DEAR SIR: I learn that the House Appropriations Committee, after a consideration of the estimate submitted by this office for the expenses of continuing the work of the Tenth Census in the next fiscal year, has settled upon the sum of $10,000 therefor, and that this sum will be reported in the sundry civil bill instead of $75,000, as submitted by me in estimate for this purpose.

If this action of the committee shall meet the approval of the Congress all work on the Tenth Census must cease on the 1st proximo. The sum thus concluded upon is based upon nothing in the knowledge or experience of this office, and unless it is intended as an expression of the judgment of the Appropriations Commitee that the report of the Tenth Census should not be completed and published, I am wholly at a loss to understand its purport.

The sum of $75,000 was submitted by this office under date of April 17, 1884, as the estimated amount required for the completion of compilations and continuation of the publications of the Tenth Census in the next fiscal year. It is now my deliberate judgment that this sum represents the minimum required for the purpose indicated if continued in the most economical manner. With any less, such a reduction of force will be essential as to seriously cripple the progress of the work; with only $10,000 the entire force must be dispensed with from July 1. For although with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior I have already arranged for a removal of the locale of the force to another building at a reduced rental of $2,600 per annum, nevertheless the rent with the salaries of the Superintendent and chief clerk would exhaust the appropriation, leaving not one dollar for clerks, watchmen, or laborers. All work at the Government Printing Office in the publication of the census volumes would have to cease, except the completien of the printing of the matter for the eighth volume of the quarto series, the revised proofs of which in its entirety are in the hands of the Public Printer.

Parts of succeeding volumes are in type, but no further progress could be made by the Public Printer without the preparation of additional copy by this office, and for that work no force could be employed. It is needless to add that the provisions of House bill 7071 directing the printing of additional copies of the compendium and of certain monograph reports, which bill has passed the House and has been reported favorably to the Senate from the Census Committee in that body, would be rendered wholly inoperative should this proposed reduction obtain.

Only by the most rigid economy could the additional expense imposed by this bill upon this office in the revision of matter for a second edition in addition to the completion of tabulations, &c., and other matters for original volumes yet to issue, be met by the appropriation of the full sum of $75,000 which had been submitted in estimate before the above bill was introduced.

If it is the purpose of the honorable Committee on Appropriations to herewith conclude the report on the Tenth Census, and such purpose meets the approval of the House and Senate, I defer without further comment. In such case provision should be made for the final disposition of the vast mass of schedules and other material which have been gathered in the preparation of the report. If, however, it is contemplated by your honorable bodies that this magnificent report shall be completed and published, I most respectfully but most earnestly submit that the proposed appropriation will be utterly inadequate to the accomplishment of the contemplated result.

Very respectfully,

GEO. W. RICHARDS,
Acting Superintendent.

Hon. S. S. COX, M. C.,
Chairman Census Committee, House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., June 23, 1884.

SIR: I trust that you will not deem me obtrusively solicitous about the item of appropriation for this office for the next fiscal year if I venture to submit a few observations additional to those contained in my letter of the 21st instant. But as I had no opportunity to present in person the case of this office to the honorable Committee on Appropriations, I am led by the action of that committee to infer that the condition of our work may not have been fully understood when dealing with the estimate submitted by me of the sum required for the work on the Tenth Census in the next fiscal year.

I have heretofore had the honor to represent to you and to demonstrate by the figures that the preparation of the report of the Tenth Census has been an economical exercise of an administrative function, and that by comparison with preceding censuses it has been relatively the cheapest ever undertaken, the actual cost per capita having been only 1 cent more than that of the Ninth Census, while in accuracy, scope, and value of results it is unique, and its extraordinary and unexampled statistical merit has been cordially recognized by every prominent country, not even excepting its own.

The total amount of appropriations for this work to date is $5,000,000, of which sum $2,316,595 were paid for enumeration, leaving $2,683,405 which has been expended in the compilation and tabulation of the general statistics of population, agriculture, manufactures, &c., and on the reports of special agents to whom were confided certain investigations as provided by the acts of March 3, 1879, and April 20, 1880, and for all contingencies, rent, office furniture, &c.—a not at all extravagant expenditure when considered in the light of the valuable results thereby attained.

The entire report, if completed, will occupy from fifteen to eighteen quarto volumes of about 1,000 pages each; of these seven volumes, aggregating about 7,000 pages, have been published. Volume 8 has been stereotyped, and the full edition is now being printed as rapidly as the facilities of the Government Printing Office will permit. Volume 9 is almost wholly composed, and parts of other volumes of the series have been put in type, and are otherwise in various stages of advancement. The compilations for the remaining volumes have been completed except for the reports relating to churches, schools, and libraries, defective, dependent, and delinquent classes of the population, and the statistics of mortality. These would all be completed by October 1 proximo were there no interruption in our labors. The other work of preparing all remaining matter for press would consist wholly of casting copy, proof-reading, and revision, with such work as might be required of the draughtsman in connection with the maps and other illustrations which illumine the various reports in the several volumes.

In addition to the above unfinished work on the matter yet unpublished the House has passed a bill, No. 7071, to which I referred in my communication of the 21st instant, authorizing the publication of additional copies of the Compendium of the Tenth Census, together with separate editions of various monograph reports, and directing that all necessary corrections of errata in former editions of any of the same shall first be made by the Superintendent. This bill has been favorably reported in the Senate and may reasonably be expected to become a law.

To complete the work of the Tenth Census as provided by the act of March 3, 1879, to continue the labor necessitated by the act of August 7, 1882, and to carry out the provisions of the House bill 7071 will require, I again respectfully submit, not less than the sum of $75,000 in the next fiscal year. To estimate less would do violence to my best judgment, based upon a matured experience of the condition and requirements of the office and with due regard to the necessity and propriety of the most exacting economy.

To appropriate $10,000 only would be to incur an expense in that sum for which no definite advance could be hoped. Such a sum would meet the rent of the office and enable me to discharge my responsibilities as custodian of the records besides paying the salary of the Superintendent, but the personnel of the office would otherwise be wholly abolished; the constant demands for statistical data or other information could meet with no response; the functions of the Public Printer in his relation to this work under the provisions of the act of August 7, 1882, would be wholly suspended, and the work on the Tenth Census in its various stages would neither be completed nor definitely terminated.

I therefore venture the hope that you, who are yourself so familiar both with the general character and value of this great work and with the requirements of this office, may be able to represent the matter to the Committee on Appropriations and to the House in such light that a further consideration of the estimate already submitted by me may be had, and that the sum therein asked, based as it was upon an anxious and scrupulous study of the situation, may receive the approval of the House.

Very respectfully,

GEO. W. RICHARDS,
Acting Superintendent.

Hon. S. S. COX, M. C.,
Chairman Census Committee, House of Representatives.

Mr. RANDALL. In reply to the gentleman from New York I wish to call his attention to the law of last year, which appropriated $100,000 for the work of taking the census and closing the bureau. Of course Congress ought to have understood what they were about, and it was supposed the appropriation of $100,000 would be sufficient to finish the work and close the bureau; but instead of that—and that is the evil which seems common to all these bureaus—they come back after that appropriation of $100,000 and ask for another appropriation of $75,000.

The committee in considering the matter were willing to go to the extent of the Superintendent's salary for another year, even though that was to cease according to law on the 30th of this month, and allow $10,000 additional for continuing the Superintendent and employing the clerks for another year—or I think there was no limitation as to time, though it was suggested in the committee, or rather it was put in up to the 1st of November; that is to say, we allowed from the 30th of the present month to the 1st of November to complete the work that should have been completed on the 30th of the present month. That is the reason the committee went that far.

Mr. COX, of New York. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me just a moment out of his time, as I propose to support his bill, I wish to say simply this, that of the $5,000,000 appropriated for this purpose $2,316,595 were paid for enumeration, leaving $2,683,405 to be expended in the compilation and tabulation of the general statistics of population, agriculture, manufacturing, &c., and in the reports of the special agents. And here is just where the trouble came in: these special agents, experts, extended the work perhaps too far. But they are very useful, in fact indispensable, not merely for our legislation, but for social science and for general information and for generally advertising our country at home and abroad.

I think if the matter be fully understood, as it will be, we may have a provision in this bill to satisfy the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the committee of which he is the head to accomplish the objects to which I have referred.

Mr. RYAN. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. CHACE. Nothing but the fact that we have wasted seven months of time already would justify me in not opposing the passage of this bill in this manner.

But I notice in the bill a few items to which the country ought to have its attention called; and, first, that this committee make no appropriation for carrying on the Territorial court of the Territory of Utah. The last year's bill appropriated for this purpose $26,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I will answer that, with the gentleman's permission.

Mr. CHACE. Not out of the short time allotted to me.

Mr. RANDALL. I can answer it so quick that there will be no time lost. The gentleman from Illinois, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, provides for that in his substitute.

Mr. CHACE. But that amendment is not reported by this committee and is not a part of this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the House will agree to that proposition.

Mr. CHACE. But suppose it is not adopted. It is a curious provision for the Appropriations Committee to make, depending as it does upon an amendment from another committee not yet introduced.

Mr. RANDALL. We will make the provision in another way if it is not adopted in the manner suggested.

Mr. CHACE. The interest of the country centering on this question is very great, and provision should be made for it.

The next item which I notice is a provision for the inspection of cattle for export, a reduction of $40,000. There the committee have attacked another great interest of the country.

The next item is the provision for the Coast Survey, which is a beneficence to the country; they have stricken off $149,000. And, finally, for public printing one half a million dollars' reduction. To this latter clause I wish to call special attention, for all through this session it has been almost impossible to get a copy of a bill or a report because the Public Printer has not been provided with sufficient means for that purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. I can explain that too in a moment, and also in reference to the Coast Survey. We give to the Coast Survey $501,000. Last year it was $555,000, a reduction of $54,000. But we increase the surveys of the States under the Geological Survey to $240,000, or over $100,000, thereby giving a large part of the Coast Survey work to the Geological Survey. Practically we have increased the survey $110,000 in this bill.

Mr. CHACE. I find by the report which the gentleman furnishes himself with this bill that it is $149,000 less.

Mr. RANDALL. There is perhaps some confusion created in the mind of the gentleman by the fact that last year they had $100,000 for a vessel.

Mr. COOK. I wish to ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment if it does not come out of the time of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. RYAN. I can not yield in the short time that I have remaining if it comes out of my time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that it would have to come out of the time of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. COOK. I shall not ask to consume any of his time then.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, there are some matters relating to this bill to which I desire to call the attention of the House. We have usually in the sundry civil bill heretofore made provision for maintaining the revenue-cutter service on the coast of Alaska. No provision is made for this service in this bill. It was omitted upon the theory that the Territorial government recently provided superseded the necessity for this revenue-cutter service. That is a misapprehension, and it is of the utmost importance to our interests along that coast—the otter-hunting-ground interest and the seal-fishing interest—that we maintain that service; and I desire now merely to call the attention of the House to the subject. And in that connection I desire to print a letter which I have just received from the chief of the revenue-marine division which sets forth the necessity for it:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, REVENUE-MARINE, June 23, 1884.

SIR: Respectfully referring to your request to be furnished with any reasons which exist why the service of a revenue-cutter should be maintained in Alaskan waters as hitherto, notwithstanding the establishment by recent act of Congress of a Territorial government for that Territory, I beg leave to invite your attention to the following facts:

1. This vast region, with its immense number of islands, its numerous inlets, bays, and harbors, offers facilities for the introduction of smuggled goods unrivaled by any part of the coast of the United States. The establishment of a local government, by opening up portions of this country to settlement, will render greater protection necessary than hitherto even. There are many parties already engaged in smuggling rum into Alaska. Were the cutter withdrawn this practice would be greatly increased.

2. The seal fisheries furnish a revenue to the Government of over $300,000 per annum. The cutter affords the only protection to these interests. Were it withdrawn these seal fisheries would be soon destroyed through the indiscriminate killing of these animals by unauthorized persons who annually visit Alaskan waters in vessels fitted out for unlawful trading and hunting.

3. The Indians of the Aleutian Islands depend for subsistence upon the hunting of the sea otter, which furnishes a very valuable fur. These animals are carefully guarded by the natives from extermination. Were hunters allowed to hunt them in the usual way they would soon disappear and the Indians be thrown upon the Government (whose wards they are) for maintenance. The cutters protect the otter-hunting grounds against access by unauthorized persons.

4. Illicit traders in rum and fire-arms annually frequent the northern waters, within the Arctic, as well as those of the Aleutian Archipelago, debauching the natives and introducing disorder and lawlessness. The cutters hold these in check and are the only means of arresting the evil.

5. The cutters afford the only relief to the large American whaling fleet which annually visits the Arctic waters north of Alaska. Within three years one hundred and fifty shipwrecked people have been brought down from the Alaskan waters by the revenue-cutter. Should the revenue steamer be withdrawn there remains no relief to the hardy whalers whose vessels are crushed in the desolate ice-fields of the northwestern seas of the continent.

6. Sitka, where the capital of the Territorial government is to be, is 700 miles from Kodiak, where one of its judges is to reside, and 1,300 miles from Ounalaska, where another will be stationed, and more than 2,000 miles from the northern borders of the Territory. There are no lines of steamers or other means of communication between the ports of this, as we may say, fragmentary government, save the revenue steamer. Remove the cutter, and each Territorial judge becomes as isolated as if in mid-ocean.

7. None of the duties enumerated can be performed by any other means should the revenue-marine steamer be taken away. In my judgment all these duties are essential and ought not to be intermitted for a single season.

8. Finally, the establishment of a Territorial government in Alaska will give more work for a vessel of the revenue marine rather than less. I do not see how the new government can be made effective without the use of vessels in putting it into operation and maintaining communication between its ports.

For thirteen years I have given much attention to Alaskan matters, and it is my judgment that no money of the Government is better spent than that used in the maintenance of a revenue-marine steamer in the waters of Alaska. Its withdrawal now would be unwise and injurious to the public interests in my opinion.

I might call other facts to your attention did time permit.

I am, respectfully, yours,

E. W. CLARK,
Chief Revenue Marine Division.

Hon. THOMAS RYAN,
Appropriations Committee, House of Representatives.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. As the gentleman from Kansas has very limited time I desire to ask him a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. RYAN. I have but a moment.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. It is a short question.

Mr. RYAN. Very well; put your question.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The gentleman from Kansas is speaking on behalf of the Republican party of this House in advocacy of this bill. I find in it a clause which puts a special premium on convict labor by providing that in Montana the labor of convicts shall be utilized as much as possible in the conduct of the work there authorized. Am I to understand that he favors that item?

Mr. RYAN. I am not speaking in any partisan sense. This is a business bill and not one of a partisan character. I do not propose now to be drawn into a political discussion.

I desire to call attention to another feature of the bill. That is in regard to the surveys of the public lands. The estimates were $600,000. This bill carries but $300,000. For the current year we gave $425,000. Now, I submit that inasmuch as it costs $174,000 to maintain the machinery for making these surveys, it is not good business policy to refuse to appropriate the amount needed to survey the public lands. The idea of giving $300,000 to survey the public lands and $174,000 to maintain the necessary machinery is, to say the least of it, absurd from a business standpoint.

I desire also to call attention to the fact that this bill carries no provision whatever for maintaining the National Board of Health. It is in effect to abolish that board.

I desire to call attention to another thing. We are paying large rents for buildings for offices for our pension work. We have in process of construction a pension building. We are told officially that it will take $266,000 to complete that building. We are asked to make that appropriation and we refuse to appropriate a single dollar.

I desire also to call attention to the appropriation for the State, War, and Navy building. We are told that it will take a million and a half to complete that building, and we are asked to make an appropriation of that sum in three equal annual amounts—$500,000 this year, $500,000 next year, and $500,000 the year after. Instead of giving the $500,000, as we ought to do now, we appropriate but $350,000, thus delaying the completion of that building and protracting the necessity of paying large rents for public offices for the transaction of the public business.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much time remains for debate?

The SPEAKER. Six minutes, the Chair is advised.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield all but one minute of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER].

I desire to say in the one minute I have for myself that the appropriation made for the survey of public lands in this bill is $300,000. That is the full amount of the appropriation made in former years until the year 1881. Up to that time and including that year $300,000 alone was appropriated. Two appropriations of $400,000 have been made since. The committee thought it wise to go back to the system of appropriating $300,000, and accordingly recommend that sum in this bill.

I do not agree with the gentleman from Kansas as to the propriety of hastening the survey of those lands. I think that until our system of disposing of the public lands should be perfected so as to cut off the frauds which are depriving the actual settlers of their just rights, until that is accomplished, the survey of the public lands should virtually cease.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask to have one minute.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to take that one minute at this time?

Mr. RANDALL. Not now; but after the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER].

Mr. POTTER. I rise to say a word in reference to the appropriation for enabling the Executive Departments of the Government, those named upon page 34 of the bill, to participate in the proposed exhibition at New Orleans. I find $500,000 appropriated to enable these Departments to attend that exhibition.

Eighty thousand dollars for the War Department. I should like to know to what use for the benefit of the country this $80,000 is to be put by the War Department in attending that exhibition. Is it for the display of guns? Is it for the display simply of material of war? For what purpose should this amount be appropriated to the War Department to attend this exhibition?

For the Navy Department, $60,000. A similar question may be asked as to this.

For the State Department, $10,000. For the Fish Commission $100,000. For the Department of the Interior, including the Bureau of Education, $165,000.

I would like to ask upon what ground, and for what reason, this enormous appropriation for the purposes of this exhibition is to be justified. If every interest in this Government is to be treated in a similar way, we may be asked, and shall be during the next year, for a dairy exhibition or a cheese exhibition, that all the Departments of the Government shall be sent there to make whatever expenditure they shall see fit, and at least $500,000 appropriated. We may be asked for an appropriation for a cattle exhibition in the same way, and so on with all material interests of this country.

I deny, sir, that there is any need of this or that any good can come from this vast expenditure to enable these Executive Departments to attend in ever-so-great pageantry this exhibition or any other exhibition.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. This was done at the Philadelphia exhibition.

Mr. POTTER. I know that it is said we did the same thing at Philadelphia. But, sir, that exhibition at Philadelphia was at the close of the first one hundred years in our history. It was a proper time to make such a display. It was a national exhibition. We paused then to take notice and ask the world to take notice of the progress of this Government, its establishment, its history, and its vast accomplishments.

If this is to be repeated for every State fair that takes place in this Union, I can only say that we will have entered upon a new era of expenditure to which there will be no end. I protest against the propriety of any such expenditure as this.

Mr. RANDALL. In reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] I want to say that the exposition at New Orleans is to be a great international exposition, embracing, as I hope, all the countries of the western hemisphere. More, it celebrates the centennial of the first exportation of cotton from this country, that great staple of the South, and for these reasons our liberality is invited toward it.

It is true that money was given to the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia. Why not give money to the centennial exposition in the Southern section of our country? The benefits resulting from the money given and loaned to the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia reaped by the mechanism of our country can not be estimated in mere dollars and cents. I hope that not only will there be no other gentleman found to condemn this appropriation than the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER], but that it will meet the cordial response of the people of the United States.

Now, as to the question of the employment of convict labor. The gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] appeared before the committee and asked an appropriation of $25,000. I have his proposition here. The committee directed that an appropriation of $15,000 be placed in the bill for the purpose desired by him. Perhaps no other member of the committee than myself is responsible for the insertion of that clause. I will say, however, that while it was put in as requested by the gentleman, it never entered my mind that it was going to be used to promote the employment of convict labor in competition with free American labor in any part of the country. If such is the case, I should be quite willing that it go out of the bill by common consent.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I am astonished that such a little matter has created so great a commotion. I do not think that this provision is at all deserving of the criticism of the gentleman from Saint Louis. This is no proposition for a competition between convict labor and the labor of mechanics. There is no labor contract involved in this matter. It is simply this: the United States penitentiary at Deer Lodge has not half capacity to hold the prisoners confined in it. They are so crowded in the one wing of the building now erected that it is unhealthy and indecent. The officials in charge of this prison so report.

But they have neglected from time to time to submit proper estimates in detail to the Department of Justice of the probable cost of completing this penitentiary according to the original plan. The Department having no data did not submit any estimates—has not done so for some years. Therefore, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has said, I introduced a bill. I thought by employing the convicts to build their own walls and cells I would be more likely to secure an appropriation. I wanted about $40,000, but consented to accept $25,000 for this year. By utilizing the labor of the convicts this would come near to building the central hall and the other wing of the building. The committee has granted $15,000 for this year and authorized the building to be completed in accordance with the original plan. I am thankful for this. I do not stand for the clause in regard to the labor of the convicts. I am told that it is unnecessary; that they can be employed without this direct authorization. But if it is stricken out, then the appropriation ought to be raised. Twenty-five thousand could be used this year, and a similar amount next year would, if properly expended, complete the prison in good shape. I am glad to have the Government committed to its completion, and regret that the committee had not such official estimates before it as would justify it in giving the amount I asked for. I submit the following correspondence with the Department of Justice:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., June 23, 1884.

SIR: The Committee on Appropriations have reported in sundry civil bill in favor of completing the United States penitentiary at Deer Lodge, Mont., in accordance with the original plans. Committee grants $15,000 for this year's work, for the reason that there is no official estimate calling for more. Has the United States marshal transmitted any estimate to your Department for the action of this Congress? Please answer, as bill will be considered to-day.

Respectfully,

MARTIN MAGINNIS.

To the honorable ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, June 23, 1884.

Hon. M. MAGINNIS:

The records of this Department do not show the receipt of any estimate as to cost of United States penitentiary at Deer Lodge, Mont., from the United States marshal during this session.

C. CLAY, Chief Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The time for general debate upon the bill, under the arrangement agreed to by the House, has been exhausted.

Mr. BEACH. I ask consent to print some remarks in the RECORD upon this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that unanimous consent be given for any gentleman to print in the RECORD such remarks as he desires upon this bill or its amendments.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I object.

Several MEMBERS. Do not object.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I do.

Some time subsequently Mr. O'NEILL withdrew his objection.

The SPEAKER. If there be no further objection, leave will be granted as requested.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to inquire within what period of time this printing is to be done?

The SPEAKER. No time has been indicated.

Mr. HISCOCK. It seems to me that there should not be an open permission given to print remarks until the end of the next session of Congress.

Mr. CHACE. I object to it.

M. HISCOCK. I hope there will be no objection, but that some time shall be fixed within which the privilege shall be exercised.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the proposition is not before the House.

Mr. RANDALL. By instructions of the committee I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. COOK. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOK. Is it in order now to ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment making an appropriation for expenses in contested-election cases?

The SPEAKER. There is an amendment already pending, offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL].

Mr. COOK. Will it be in order after that?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman at some time to ask consent.

The amendment offered by Mr. RANDALL was read, as follows:

On page 47, in line 1140, strike out "$33,000" and insert "$9,000," in the clause making an appropriation for fuel, light, clothing, &c., for the Freedmen's Hospital and Asylum.

Mr. RANDALL. That is to correct a mistake.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. By instructions of the committee I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After line 1244, at the end of page 51 of the printed bill, insert the following:
"That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to sell at public auction, after due advertisement, and at prices not less than those fixed by the board of appraisers in each case, the following arsenals, namely: Allegheny arsenal, Pennsylvania; Augusta arsenal, Georgia; Indianapolis arsenal, Indiana; Kennebec arsenal, Maine; and Watertown arsenal, Massachusetts; and the money so received, after paying necessary expenses, to be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. RANDALL. I call attention to the following communications from the War Department, showing the necessity for this amendment:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, February 9, 1883.

SIR: In reply to your telegram asking my opinion as to the expediency of selling or disposing of any of the arsenals of the United States, and, if so, what arsenals, I have the honor to state that the proposed legislation on this subject was suggested by this Department. After a conference between the Chief of Ordnance and myself, I am of opinion that the Allegheny arsenal, Pennsylvania; Augusta arsenal, Georgia; Indianapolis arsenal, Indiana; Kennebec arsenal, Maine; Watertown arsenal, Massachusetts, and Watervliet arsenal, New York, are no longer of use to the United States, and that it would be in the interest of economy, and for the good of the military service, to dispose of them. Aside from their being no longer of use, such disposition would do away with the expense of repairs and maintenance, and would permit a desirable concentration of officers of the Ordnance Corps at the large arsenals which it is considered desirable to retain and keep in an efficient condition, namely, the Benicia arsenal, California; Rock Island arsenal, Illinois; the Springfield armory, Massachusetts; and Frankford arsenal, Pennsylvania, besides a few ordnance depots, which are used merely for storage in convenient locations.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN, Secretary of War.

Hon. T. J. HENDERSON,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, March 3, 1884.

SIR: In connection with our conversation touching the expediency of selling or disposing of any of the arsenals of the United States, I have the honor to inclose herewith for your information a copy of a letter addressed by me, under date of February 9, 1883, to Hon. T. J. HENDERSON, then chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives, giving the views of this Department upon the subject.

There appear at this time no reasons for any modification of the views therein expressed, except in the case of the Watervliet arsenal, New York, which has been recommended by the board of officers created by the naval appropriation act of March 3, 1883, as a suitable site for the location of a Government foundery for the manufacture of heavy ordnance.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN, Secretary of War.

Hon. S. J. RANDALL,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. By instructions of the committee I offer the amendment which I now send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 74, after line 1793 of the printed bill, insert the following:
"To pay J. C. Courts for clerical services rendered to the House members of the joint commission to consider the question of the salaries of the officers and employés of the House and of the Senate, authorized by the act of March 3, 1883, $300."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. By instructions of the Committee on Appropriations I move an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk, to come in after the amendment just adopted.

The amendment was read, as follows:

To enable the Clerk of the House to pay to the officers and employés of the House of Representatives borne on the annual and session rolls on the 30th day of June, 1884, one month's pay, at the rate of compensation then paid them by law, which sum shall be immediately available.

Mr. SHELLEY. I ask that the Capitol police be included in that amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to reserve all points of order on the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to say that the committee submits this amendment because a similar provision has been included in the sundry civil appropriation bills for the last three years. I desire to have the point of order determined before the debate on the merits of the question is entered upon.

Mr. KEIFER. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw the point of order and let the House vote upon the proposition.

Mr. KELLEY. May I ask whether this amendment covers those who were officers of the House during the last session?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. It does not.

Mr. KELLEY. If this is based on the precedents of three or four former sessions why should it not include the officers of the last session?

Mr. RANDALL. They were given this extra pay at the last session.

Mr. SHELLEY. I ask that the Capitol police be included in this amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no instructions in regard to extending the amendment to the Capitol police.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] desire to say anything on the point of order?

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, it has been said that such a provision as this has been contained in three previous appropriation bills. It is not assumed that any law has authorized this appropriation. On the other hand, the salaries of all these gentlemen employed by the House are amply provided for by law, and those salaries are ample without the necessity of any additional compensation to be voted at the end of each session. Propositions of this kind have been allowed heretofore upon the theory that they would equalize the pay of House and Senate employés. But we find as a fact that the Senate amends these propositions so as to include its own employés. You can not expect this provision to go through without its being enlarged to cover Senate employés as well as those of the House.

Mr. THOMPSON. Has it not been the object of these appropriations to cover the mileage or traveling expenses of those employés who come here from a distance?

Mr. HOLMAN. I never heard an appropriation of this kind put upon any such ground. Gentleman must remember that this mode of increasing salaries is a modern invention; it never occurred till a few years ago. If you go back even to the Forty-fourth Congress you will find no such appropriation.

Mr. THOMPSON. I feel certain that this extra compensation has been voted regularly for a longer time than that, because I have been here longer; and I know the appropriation has been made ever since I have been here.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is a very pleasant thing for us to appropriate money for gentlemen who are in daily association with us, and it is very ungracious to oppose such appropriations. But there is no provision of law authorizing this expenditure of the public money, and if I should fail to oppose an appropriation of this kind affecting our immediate associates or friends I should feel myself more derelict in the discharge of my duty than if the appropriation related to those employed in other branches of the public service. Hence I feel it my duty to make the same point of order here which I should make if an appropriation of $45,000 were proposed for persons employed elsewhere. I think that my friend from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON], if this were a proposition to give $45,000 to some other employés of the Government, would promptly raise the point of order.

Mr. THOMPSON. I would like to ask my friend from Indiana one question. In the long session of the last Congress did he not make a speech in favor of this very thing and aid in securing its passage?

Mr. HOLMAN. I never did.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think the RECORD shows you did.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman does not think so, I think.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think I do; and I am informed by the librarian that the record so shows.

Mr. HOLMAN. What librarian?

Mr. THOMPSON. The librarian back there [pointing to the Hall library], who has just read the RECORD.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, sir, it is a mistake.

Mr. THOMPSON. The speech of the gentleman was made in the long session of the last Congress.

Some time subsequently

Mr. HOLMAN asked and obtained unanimous consent to print in the RECORD, in connection with his remarks, the following from the debate upon the sundry civil appropriation of the last session of Congress.

Mr. HOUSE. I move to amend by inserting after the amendment last adopted the provision which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"To enable the Clerk of the House to pay to the officers and employés of the House of Representatives borne on the annual and session rolls on the 3d day of March, 1883, one month's extra pay, at the compensation then paid them by law, which sum shall be immediately available,"

Mr. HISCOCK. I make a point of order against this amendment.

* * * * * * *

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to say a word on the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let me remind my friend from Indiana of the fact that this same provision was put into the sundry civil appropriation bill in the Forty-sixth Congress at the instance of the present Speaker of the House of Representatives. There is, therefore, more than one precedent for it.

Mr. HOLMAN. So far as the history of this proposed legislation is concerned, I wish to say the practice of paying a month's additional compensation is of recent origin. There is no law for it, and my recollection is it does not go beyond the Forty-fifth Congress. Furthermore, it has been confined heretofore, according to my memory, to the first session of a Congress, upon the ground the session employés are employed for quite a long period and have a large amount of business to do, and therefore such a provision for the long session is not unreasonable. That is the argument heretofore used for granting such extra month's pay during the long session of Congress. When the annual employés of Congress are only employed for a period of three months, it is now proposed by this amendment, as I understand it, to give them an additional month's pay; for this applies to the annual employés as well as to the session employés.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It applies to both.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes; I understand that it applies to both. It applies, then, to the best-paid employés of the Government as all know, and to those who are employed for only a period of three months at this short session. That is the proposition, to give them an extra month's pay. Point to any instance where this has been done as to the regular employés of this House for a short session. It has been done during the long session on account of the large amount of work done. It is now proposed to adopt a new rule and apply it to the short session. So far as my memory extends, Mr. Chairman, this is without precedent.

So, Mr. Chairman, there can be no pretense that there is either law or precedent for this, if I am correct. I certainly have not been able to find any, and I do not think any has been cited by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana say that there is no precedent for the payment of this extra compensation at the close of a short session of Congress?

Mr. HOLMAN. My recollection is that it has been confined entirely to the Forty-fifth Congress and since, and even then to the long session instead of the short session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair remembers that there used to be an extra percentage allowed. If there has been no precedent the Chair will take the responsibility of ruling upon the question; but declines to rule where the House has set a precedent, and prefers to submit the matter to the judgment of the committee.

Mr. HOUSE. Mr. Chairman, in the short session of the Forty-sixth Congress, if I am not entirely mistaken, a resolution in all respects similar to this was passed, and included also both classes of employés. I think that will be found to be the case on examination.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the question to the committee: Shall the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee be held to be in order?

The question was taken.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 71, noes 48.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum has voted.

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not make that point now; let us get through with the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. With the understanding that we can have a yea-and-nay vote on this in the House I will not insist upon it.

Mr. HISCOCK. You would be entitled to a vote in the House, this being an amendment to the bill, if you have a sufficient number to call the yeas and nays.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana insist upon the point of order?

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair finds upon an examination of the records that on two occasions heretofore an amendment similar to this—the Chair thinks in precisely the same language—has been offered and a point of order made against it; and in both instances the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, by a very large vote, held the provision to be in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; but does that action of the Committee of the Whole establish a rule for the control of the House? It must be apparent, Mr. Speaker, there is no law authorizing this item.

The SPEAKER. Of course the Chair is not absolutely bound by any decision of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, although such a decision is certainly entitled to very great respect when the question has been discussed and decided by that committee, consisting as it does of the same members that compose the House itself. In order to preserve uniformity in the rulings upon this question, the Chair thinks he ought to admit the amendment and allow the House to vote upon it.

Mr. HOLMAN. And hold that there is a law authorizing this appropriation, that it comes within the third section of the twenty-first rule?

The SPEAKER. The provision seems to have been held in order heretofore upon the ground that it had been included in an appropriation bill and was the law at least for that year.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I move to amend the amendment by adding the provision which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all officers and employés of the House who were employed on the 3d day of December, 1883, and who have ceased, or who shall prior to the 1st day of February, 1884, cease, to be so employed, shall be paid a sum equal to one month's pay at the rate they were severally receiving on the 3d day of December, 1883; and an amount sufficient for this purpose is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and the same to be immediately available.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to say that I am not authorized by the committee to accept that as an amendment. The House may. I also desire to say that these officers, just as we now provide by that proposition coming from the committee to which reference is made by the gentleman from Iowa, did receive on the 4th of March last one month's additional pay.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is also true that we have always been accustomed, I think, with but one exception——

Mr. VALENTINE. And that is the time the Democrats came in at the Forty-fourth Congress.

Mr. HISCOCK. We have always been accustomed to make this allowance, I think, and it comes within the same point of order.

The SPEAKER. No point of order has been made on it.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is in accordance with the general custom.

Mr. RANDALL. I will allow it to be voted on, as far as I can.

Mr. HISCOCK. I say distinctly I have no doubt this side of the House will always be willing to reciprocate. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Does that include the Capitol police?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have the amendment again reported. The Chair appeals to gentlemen on the floor to preserve order.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 87, noes 15.

So the amendment of Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHELLEY. I move to amend by adding after the words "session rolls" the following, "and the Capitol police."

Mr. HOLMAN. If any part of this is in order the whole of it is. I suppose the amendment is germane to the original proposition. It is an ungrateful thing to make the point of order against any employé of the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Alabama on the point of order.

Mr. SHELLEY. I have no remarks to make, but will leave the Chair to decide.

The SPEAKER. The Capitol police are not employés of the House. They are a different class entirely. It would be just as germane to increase the salary of the Secretary of State or the Secretary of the Treasury on this as to increase the salary of the Capitol police. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MCCOID. In the amendment just adopted the date 1st day of February is fixed. I move to strike out "1st" and insert "15th," because there are two officers I know of who ceased to serve after the first of February and before the 15th, and it would be unjust to exclude them from that provision. I know the committee who reported the bill did not intend to do so, nor did the gentleman who offered the amendment. It is simply a change of the date to when these officers ceased to serve.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 21.

So Mr. MCCOID'S amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL'S amendment as amended was then adopted.

Mr. RANDALL. I am directed by the committee to strike out, on page 83, the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

And no speech or portion of a speech or remarks shall be printed in the RECORD that shall not have been delivered upon the floor of Congress in open session.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 102, noes 17.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON. I move, on page 74, to insert the following amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. It is important it should come in at the proper place.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MORRISON. I move the following amendment.

Page 74, after line 1798, insert—

"To pay Charles H. Evans, Treasury clerk, for services rendered on the request of the Ways and Means Committee, $114.30."

Mr. MORRISON. The following letter explains the amendment:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
Washington, D. C., June 21, 1884.

SIR: In reply to your inquiry I have to inform you that the sum of $52.75 was deducted from your salary on account of twelve days' absence in February, and that the sum of $61.55 was deducted from your salary on account of fourteen days' absence during the month of March, the total amount of such deductions being $114.30. The deduction was made at the appointment-room of the Treasury Department. Subsequently I called upon the Secretary of the Treasury in reference to this matter, and stated to him that I had approved the pay-roll allowing you the amounts deducted upon the theory that the work which you were doing at the Capitol was helpful to this office. In other words, that if you had not gone there to do the work it would have been sent to me, and I should have had to employ you and probably one or two other clerks upon it. But the Secretary took a different view of the case. He seemed to think that as the Ways and Means Committee had the benefit of your services they ought to provide for your compensation. This, of course, determined the case so far as it concerned me.

Respectfully,

JOSEPH NIMMO, Jr., Chief of Bureau.

To CHAS. H. EVANS, Esq.,
Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I send up a further amendment to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the amendment just adopted insert:

"To pay to the heirs of the late Andrew J. Herron, a member-elect to the Forty-eighth Congress, $6,000.

"To pay to the widow and children of J. T. Updegraff, a member-elect to the Forty-eighth Congress, $6,000."

Mr. HOLMAN, I believe the point of order will lie against this amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. I would like to inquire, if we are to go back to pay these parties, if there is not a third case which would also come under the same terms? My recollection is that there were three cases of that kind, and if so provision should be made for each of them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Indiana to raise the question of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order against the amendment.

The SPEAKER. What point of order does the gentleman raise?

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe there is no law authorizing the appropriation. I think the last Congress and the Congress before the last, and perhaps both the Forty-sixth and Forty-seventh Congresses, made appropriations of this character. But I believe that no appropriation of this kind has been made, except perhaps in two instances, unless the member for whose family the appropriation was recommended had become a member of the Congress during which the appropriation was made.

I am aware, sir, that the temper of the House and the disposition manifested to-day to extend somewhat broadly the powers of Congress in the appropriation of the public money renders the raising of a point of order against such a provision as this rather an ungracious task. But I can not be unmindful of the fact, nor can any other member, of the rules adopted for our guidance. I think they had better be adhered to when we find ourselves brought face to face with questions of this character not directly in the line of our duties as legislators. I believe the rules had better be adhered to in all cases as a guide to the deliberations of the House when it is called upon to take action with reference to a particular subject-matter.

For myself, I am not able to perceive any power resting in Congress or any authority under the rules for any such legislation as that proposed to be ingrafted upon this bill. Therefore I make the point of order against it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware of any law authorizing any such payments to be made.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, it is proper to say that there have been various precedents set by the action of the House in regard to cases of this kind, and to those I desire briefly to call the attention of the Chair.

The first case that occurred arose on the death of Mr. Schleicher, of Texas, in the Forty-fifth Congress. He died during the last session of that Congress, and a joint resolution was passed by unanimous consent in that Congress by which the payment of the remainder of his salary was directed to be made to his widow and children, and recommending to the Forty-sixth Congress, to which he had been elected, that there be paid to his widow and children the salary for the entire term of the Forty-seventh Congress. He died before his term began in the Forty-sixth Congress. When that matter came up in the Forty-sixth Congress no point of order was made against it.

The SPEAKER. So the Chair supposes; and hence it is not a precedent, as the gentleman will perceive.

Mr. LEWIS. I am aware of that; but I wish to call the attention of the House to other cases.

The next cases were those of Mr. Fernando Wood and of Mr. Farr. These occurred during the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress. Mr. Wood died during the Forty-sixth Congress, at the end of the last session of that Congress, but had been re-elected to the Forty-seventh Congress. He died therefore before his term of service in the Forty-seventh Congress began. So also was the case with Mr. Farr, who died before his term began.

When the sundry civil appropriation bill was reported in the Forty-sixth Congress an appropriation was made to pay the families of these two gentlemen $6,000 each. Points of order were made against both provisions. Both points of order were submitted to the House for its action, and were overruled in each case. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] himself participated in the discussion of that question on that occasion, and the House on both occasions specifically overruled the point of order.

The next question of this character arose during the last session of the Forty-seventh Congress. The committee had reported in favor of paying Mr. Updegraff, of Ohio. The point of order was made in that case, and expressly overruled by the House. An amendment was offered by my predecessor [Mr. Robertson] proposing a like amount to be paid to the heirs of Mr. Andrew J. Herron, and the point of order was again overruled.

I state these facts, and the RECORD, which I have before me, will bear me out with reference to them, merely to show that the point of order was overruled in several distinct cases precisely similar to these: in the cases of Mr. Wood and the widow of Mr. Farr, and also in the case of Mr. Schleicher, though, as I have said, no point of order was raised in the latter case. The point of order was also raised in the Forty-seventh Congress on these two particular cases and overruled.

When the discussion took place in the Forty-seventh Congress upon these two cases the appropriation was stricken out of the sundry civil bill upon the motion, I believe, of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER], wherein he made the point of order that it was not competent for the Forty-seventh Congress to make an appropriation to pay a member of the Forty-eighth Congress. The point of order, however, was distinctly overruled by the House on the occasions to which I have referred.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to see the RECORD to which the gentleman from Louisiana refers. [After a pause.] The Chair finds upon an examination of the proceedings of the House upon questions of this character that the decisions in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union have been both ways. In some cases they have decided the amendment was in order, and in some cases that it was not in order. The judgment of the Chair is that such amendments are not in order, because there is no law authorizing these expenditures so far as the Chair is aware. And in that state of the case where there is no authority for decision either way the Chair feels he ought to exercise his own best judgment in the matter, and holds the amendment to be not in order.

Mr. LEWIS. Let the question be submitted to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be very glad to have it submitted to the House because of the different ways in which the House has decided this question. The gentleman from Louisiana appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. REESE. Before the House votes upon that I should like to have read an amendment to the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The vote of the House will decide whether the proposed amendment of the gentleman is in order.

Mr. BAGLEY. I move to lay on the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The motion to lay the appeal on the table was agreed to; and accordingly the decision of the Chair stood as the judgment of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. The last amendment to be acted upon is that proposed by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. Before entering upon that I desire to obtain some understanding as to the limit of debate. And I have this suggestion to make, that there be thirty minutes' debate on each side; five minutes to each of six members on the respective sides.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the last point of the gentleman's suggestion?

Mr. RANDALL. That there be one hour of debate—thirty minutes for and thirty minutes against—under the five-minute rule.

Mr. KEIFER. I suggest to the gentleman to make it half an hour for general debate.

Mr. RANDALL. Very well; I will make it half an hour. The weather is greatly in favor of the shorter time.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to say when the amendment is offered I wish to make a point of order against the whole amendment. But I suppose the understanding allows us to make the point of order against each paragraph of it while the amendment is under consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands all points of order that can be made against the amendment are reserved.

Mr. RANDALL. Any right to make points of order which exists under the rules is by the terms of the agreement in no manner impaired, except that the proposition is to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KEIFER. Then it is to be taken up by paragraphs and each paragraph made subject to a point of order. Now, I do not believe—though I am not advised on the point—that gentlemen desire to discuss this amendment in general debate at all. I think all the discussion might be under the five-minute rule.

Mr. RANDALL. That was my proposition; that there should be an hour for debate—thirty minutes to be given to six gentlemen on each side in periods of five minutes each.

Mr. KEIFER. But if the amendment is to be discussed under the five-minute rule why provide for general debate?

Mr. RANDALL. Very well; let the debate proceed under the five-minute rule at once.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is a very important measure—the adjusting of these salaries. There is a reasonable amount of time at our disposal. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to permit debate to proceed a reasonable time before he seeks to close debate.

Mr. RANDALL. My anxiety is to have a vote on this bill before we reach an adjournment for dinner to-day; and I will tell gentlemen why I want it. The weather is excessively warm; and it is desirable the bill should go to the Senate in the morning; and no one wants to come back here to-night with the thermometer where it is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state it has already been the practice in considering questions in the House as in Committee of the Whole for the previous question to be ordered by the House. That is the only way to close debate. When debate is proceeding under the five-minute rule in the Committee of the Whole the committee can rise and close debate in the House. But when a bill is being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, the only way to close debate is to order the previous question when the debate has run a reasonable time.

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing debate should continue on this amendment until 5 o'clock, and that then the vote shall be taken on the amendment and the final passage of the bill. That would bring us to about 6 o'clock, if the House desires that length of time for debate. But I did think that one hour of debate, allowing five minutes to each member speaking pro and con, would be sufficient. If the House wishes a longer time I am quite content to follow the wish of the House in every particular.

Mr. HAMMOND. Call the previous question at half past 4.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am willing it should be called at half past 4.

Mr. RANDALL. It is suggested by the gentleman on my right that the previous question on the amendment and the bill shall be called at half past 4.

Mr. KEIFER. We do not desire to agree to that. There are one or two amendments, I think, which are to be offered.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not object to the amendments being offered.

Mr. KEIFER. Any such order as is suggested might cut those off. I think we might get through in the time suggested without making an order now.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I simply give the notification that at half past 4 o'clock I shall call the previous question. I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] to offer an amendment.

Mr. HAMMOND. On page 55 of the bill there is mention made of "Atlanta." There are twelve Atlantas in the United States, and I want to insert the word "Georgia" after the word "Atlanta."

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection that amendment will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. BELFORD. I took the floor some time ago, but was crowded off my feet by the pre-eminent privilege of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I have an amendment which I desire to offer. I desire to inquire whether I have the right to offer it or not as an amendment to the pending proposition?

The SPEAKER. The amendment now about to be read will be subject to amendment.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire then to offer an amendment so that it may be before the House and pending for consideration.

Mr. KEIFER. It is understood that we do not agree that either the amendment sent up by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] or the one to be proposed by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] is in order.

The SPEAKER. Of course not; they will both be subject to the rules of the House.

Mr. BELFORD. The amendment I want to offer is not the one you gentlemen are afraid of.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to ask for information whether points of order are to be made upon each clause of the amendment as reached or are they to be settled now in reference to all of the clauses? If the points of order are to be made now, I would like to have them suggested, for I am authorized by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, in case points of order are made against the substitute, to so modify it as to leave out those portions which the committee concede to be subject to points of order.

Mr. BISBEE. It is my purpose to make points of order against the whole amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that all points of order have been reserved.

Mr. KEIFER. Points of order are to be made against each separate paragraph.

Mr. SPRINGER. As you reach them?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes.

Mr. CHACE. The gentleman can not curtail the right of members to raise points of order as they may choose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. BISBEE] reserves all points of order against the entire amendment, and also reserves the right, which he has under the rules of the House, to make points of order against each paragraph as it is read.

Mr. HOLMAN. No point of order can be pending until the amendment has been read.

The SPEAKER. The amendment has not yet been offered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 3961) to grant to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railway Company right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 6871) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 28) to confirm the status of John N. Quackenbush as a commander in the United States Navy.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FORNEY. The Army appropriation bill has just been returned from the Senate with sundry amendments. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to recommend that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in, and to ask that the bill, together with the Senate amendments numbered, be printed.

There being no objection, the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 6861) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, were taken from the Speaker's table and non-concurred in; and the bill, together with the Senate amendments numbered, was ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 2228) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. 4411) to amend section 101 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, so as to allow the chairman of a subcommittee of either House to administer oaths.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7380) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BISBEE] proposes to make points of order against the entire amendment which I have been instructed to offer.

Mr. BISBEE. I will do so at the proper time.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have been instructed by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice to move to amend the bill now under consideration by striking out all that portion from line 1720 to 1763, both inclusive, and inserting in lieu thereof that which I send to the Clerk's desk. I will state that by direction of the committee I have stricken from the substitute as printed such portions as they concede to be subject to points of order under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

The portion of the bill proposed to be stricken out is as follows:

JUDICIAL.

United States courts:

For expenses of the United States courts: For defraying the expenses of the Supreme Court; the circuit and district courts of the United States, including the District of Columbia; of the jurors and witnesses, and expenses of suits in which the United States is interested; of the prosecution for offenses committed against the United States; for the safe-keeping of prisoners; for defraying the expenses which may be incurred in the enforcement of the act approved February 28, 1871, entitled "An act to amend an act approved May 30, 1870, entitled 'An act to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States to vote in the several States of the Union, and for other purposes,'" or any acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, namely, those stated in the following itemized list:

For fees and expenses of marshals and deputies, $639,000.
For payments of district attorneys and their assistants, $385,000.
For fees of clerks, $170,000.
For fees of United States commissioners, $110,000.
For fees of jurors, $410,000.
For fees of witnesses, $510,000.
For support of United States prisoners, $310,000.
For rent of United States court-rooms, $50,000.

For expenses of bailiffs; furniture; for payment of expenses of district judges who may be sent out of their districts, in pursuance of law, to hold a circuit or district court, and other miscellaneous expenses, $325,000.

For the support of convicts: For support, maintenance, and transportation of convicts transferred from the District of Columbia, and for the necessary traveling expenses incident to the collection of criminal statistics, to be disbursed by the authority of the Attorney-General, $10,000.

The substitute proposed for that portion of the bill was read, as follows:

JUDICIAL.

United States Courts:

For expenses of the United States courts: For defraying the expenses of the Supreme Court, the circuit and district courts of the United States, including the District of Columbia; of the jurors and witnesses, and expenses of suits in which the United States is interested; of the prosecution for offenses committed against the United States; for the safe-keeping of prisoners; for defraying the expenses which may be incurred in the enforcement of the provisions of title 26 of the Revised Statutes, or any acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, namely, those stated in the following itemized list:

For salaries of United States marshals, $219,000.
For salaries of marshals' clerks and chief deputies, $110,000.

For expenses of marshals, namely: For transportation to attend courts, postage on process, and for fees and expenses of deputies, and of sheriffs and constables acting as deputies, as provided by law, and for pay of special deputy marshals under title 26 of the Revised Statutes, $300,000.

For payment of salaries of United States district attorneys and their assistants, and for transportation of the district attorneys to attend courts, $350,000.

For compensation of special assistant attorneys or counsel employed under authority of law, $25,000.

For fees of clerks, $160,000.

For fees of United States commissioners and justices of the peace acting as United States commissioners, $100,000.

For fees of jurors, $400,000.
For fees of witnesses, $500,000.

For support of United States prisoners, including necessary clothing and medical aid, $300,000.

For rent of United States court-rooms, $50,000.

For pay of bailiffs, criers, and for janitors, watchmen, and interpreters, experts, and stenographers, whose employment is authorized by the Attorney-General; expenses of district judges who may be sent out of their districts to hold a court; furnishing and collecting evidence where the United States is a party in interest; meals for jurors, when ordered by the court; compensation for jury commissioner, $5 for each day actually and necessarily employed, not exceeding three days for any one term of the court; and other miscellaneous expenses, $325,000.

For the support of convicts: For support, maintenance, and transportation of convicts transferred from the District of Columbia, and for the necessary traveling expenses incident to the collection of criminal statistics, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney-General, $10,000.

For providing a uniform system of book-keeping for court officials, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney-General, $10,000.

SEC. 2. That United States marshals shall hereafter receive annually for their services the following salaries, payably monthly: Southern district of New York, $6,000; Northern New York, Massachusetts, Eastern Pennsylvania, District of Columbia, Southern Ohio, and California, $5,000 each; Maryland, Western Pennsylvania, Eastern Missouri, Kentucky, Northern Ohio, Northern and Southern Illinois, Eastern Louisiana, Kansas, and Western Texas, $4,000 each; New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Delaware, Nevada, Southern Florida, Connecticut, Northern Mississippi, and Southern Mississippi, $2,000 each; and all other marshals shall be paid a salary of $3,000 a year.

All money collected by marshals on process in behalf of the United States, and all costs for fees and expenses of marshals taxed against parties other than the United States, shall be collected by the marshals and be paid into court; and at the end of each quarter the marshal shall render a return of the moneys so collected to the Attorney-General, with receipts from the clerks of the courts for the sums paid as herein required, which returns shall be verified by the oath of the marshal; and if this statement is not received by the Attorney-General within thirty days from the close of the quarter, no further payments shall be made the marshal on account of salary until such statement is received. Upon application to him for service, the marshal, before service is made, shall exact a deposit for the costs thereof in all cases not brought by the United States, except in suits brought under chapter 3 of the Revised Statutes, for wages of seamen, wherein the costs, if not collectible from the parties to the suit, shall be charged by the marshal, clerk, and district attorney in their accounts against the United States, and shall be adjusted and paid by the accounting officers in the same manner as costs in cases brought by the United States. If he shall fail to exact such deposit he shall be responsible for the amount to the United States.

It shall be the duty of the marshal to scrutinize the bills of the deputies, sheriffs, or constables, or whoever may be employed to serve process, and when he finds the same to be correct and in accordance with law he shall pay the same; but in cases where he deems it advisable for his own protection he may withhold 25 per cent. of the amount until the said bills have been audited and allowed at the Treasury; and when so allowed he shall pay the amount found due each in full. At the close of each term of court the marshal shall make up his accounts for all fees and disbursements and submit the same to a circuit or district court, in accordance with the provisions of the act regulating fees and costs, approved February 22, 1875, which shall be examined and passed upon by the court at each term before its adjournment.

SEC. 3. That there may be allowed each United States marshal one clerk and one chief deputy, whose salaries shall be paid as provided in section 2 for the payment of marshals. The salaries shall be $1,800 a year in each of the following districts: Northern New York, Southern New York, Massachusetts, Eastern Pennsylvania, District of Columbia, Southern Ohio, Kentucky, Northern Illinois, and California.

In other districts the salary shall be determined by the Attorney-General, but shall not exceed $1,200 per annum in any case. No clerk or chief deputy shall be appointed in any district unless the Attorney-General shall deem such appointment necessary for the efficient performance of the public business.

In all districts where courts are held at more than one place at which grand jurors are impaneled the Attorney-General may, in his discretion, allow the marshal a clerk or chief deputy (but not both) at such place, in addition to the one hereintofore authorized, if the business of the office requires it, at a salary not to exceed $1,000 a year.

The Attorney-General shall provide a uniform system of book-keeping and returns, and furnish books and blanks for this purpose to United States marshals. It shall be their duty to keep all the accounts, books, and papers of their respective offices in such manner as may be required by regulations prescribed by the Attorney-General, and to perform such other duties as such regulations may require. All books, papers, and accounts relating in any way to official business shall remain in the office of the marshal and be transferred by him to his successor in office, and shall be open at all times to the inspection of parties interested.

It shall be the duty of the chief deputy marshal to assist the marshal in attending upon the sessions of the court, and to perform all other duties required of him by the marshal of the court.

No officer of the court shall require payment from any juror or witness for stating his account for expenses of transportation or for administering oath to the same; and it shall be the duty of the marshal to examine said bills before paying the same, and to strike out improper charges if any are made therein.

The marshal's clerks, the chief deputies, and other deputies shall be appointed by the Attorney-General, upon the recommendation of the marshals of the respective districts; and their oaths of office shall be filed in the Department of Justice, and they shall be of good character, and be able to read and write in the English language, and be subject to removal for cause by the Attorney-General, by the court, or marshal: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed as in any way repealing or modifying sections 2021, 2022, 2023, 2024, and 3689 of the Revised Statutes, nor of any other of the provisions of title 26 of the Revised Statutes, nor of any acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto.

SEC. 4. That deputy marshals shall be appointed in the manner provided in the foregoing section for such localities in the district as the judge of the district or circuit courts may authorize and require for the efficient transaction of the business of the United States courts of such districts in each locality, but their powers shall not be limited by the locality for which they are appointed. No person shall perform the duties of a deputy marshal unless appointed and qualified in the manner herein provided, but district or circuit courts may appoint, upon the recommendation of the marshal, any sheriff or constable holding commissions as such under State authority, to serve the writs or execute the processes issuing out of the courts in such district, after having been duly commissioned a deputy by order of the court. In all cases where practicable it shall be the duty of the marshal to send writs and processes of court by mail directed to the deputy marshal residing in the locality where writs are to be served or processes to be executed, or to the sheriff or constable appointed to serve the same in such locality, whose duty it shall be, after service, to return such writ or process by mail to the marshal; and in no case shall fees be charged or allowed for traveling between points where writs or processes were sent by mail, or where it was practicable to send them by mail. The fees now allowed by law for marshals for serving writs and processes shall hereafter be allowed to the officers serving the same, except for committing and discharging prisoners; and the clause in section 829 of the Revised Statutes prescribing 50 cents for the same is hereby repealed. No fee for serving process shall be paid to a chief deputy. Guards, when actually necessary, may be employed to assist deputy marshals, sheriffs, or constables in charge of prisoners and witnesses before commissioners or justices of the peace, but not more than two before the same officer shall be employed on any one day.

SEC. 5. That deputy marshals, sheriffs, and constables while serving court processes shall be allowed for transportion by public conveyances the amount actually paid therefor, which shall be stated in an itemized account, and shall not exceed the usual amount charged for such transportation. For traveling where there is no public conveyance they shall be allowed 10 cents per mile each way, and for serving writs and processes the fees provided by law. The costs shall in each case be indorsed in items on the back of the writ when the return is made.

SEC. 6. That the circuit or district courts of the United States may, in cases of emergency where the necessary processes of the courts can not be promptly executed by the marshal or his regular deputies so as to secure the ends of justice, enter an order of record requiring the marshal or one of his deputies, or a person appointed as special deputy marshal by the court for that purpose, to perform a particular service or execute a particular writ; and for such service there shall be allowed such compensation as may be just and reasonable, but not exceeding $2.50 a day and actual and necessary traveling expenses, in lieu of fees and mileage. All accounts for such service shall be stated in items and verified by the person performing the service, and approved as a separate account by the judge who may make the order requiring the same.

SEC. 7. That district attorneys of the United States shall hereafter be paid monthly for their services the following annual salaries, in lieu of all fees, allowances, and salary now authorized by law: Southern New York, $8,000; Northern New York, Massachusetts, Eastern and Western Pennsylvania, District of Columbia, Northern and Southern Ohio, Eastern Missouri, Northern and Southern Illinois, and California, $5,000 each; Maryland, Kentucky, Kansas, Eastern Louisiana, Northern Georgia, Western Arkansas, and Western Texas, $4,000 each; New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Delaware, Nevada, Southern Florida, Connecticut, Northern Mississippi, and Southern Mississippi, $2,000 each; and all other United States district attorneys shall be paid each a salary of $3,000 a year.

In all proceedings, civil or criminal, including prize and revenue cases, where fees or compensation of any kind are now by law authorized to be taxed against and paid by the United States for services of district attorneys or their assistants, no fees or percentages or commissions shall be charged or allowed on that account. In all cases, civil or criminal, including prize and revenue cases, where services are performed by district attorneys or their assistants, and the costs are taxed against other parties than the United States, the amount of such costs or fees for such service shall be collected and paid into court. United States district attorneys shall, under the direction of the Attorney-General, attend to the interests of the United States in every suit or proceeding in which the United States is concerned, in any of the courts of the United States or in the courts of any State, or attend to any other interest of the United States in their respective districts.

SEC. 8. That the district attorneys, marshals, and clerks shall be allowed, once for each term of court, the actual amount paid by them for transportation in going to and returning from the place where the court may be held in the district, the itemized accounts for such transportation to be made out and verified as hereinafter provided in other cases where transportation is allowed. District attorneys shall also be allowed the actual amount paid by them for necessary transportation to and from their places of abode to places where criminal examinations are held, or from one such place to another.

SEC. 9. That the fees earned by the clerks of United States courts, the supreme and district courts of the Territories, and the courts of the District of Columbia for services in civil and criminal cases and in naturalization cases, and for making out, certifying, or authenticating all papers, and in bankruptcy proceedings, and for duties of masters in chancery, or as special commissioners or referees by order of the court, or taking or authenticating depositions, issuing certificates admitting attorneys to practice, and in all matters of any name and character incident to their office or by virtue or authority of the court, and as United States commissioners, if holding said office, shall be included in their semi-annual returns to the Attorney-General; and it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to decide what expenses may be paid by such clerks out of the surplus emoluments of their offices. At the end of each quarter they shall make out an itemized statement of all costs paid into court in United States cases, showing what disposition has been made of the same and in what cases they accrued, and submit the same to the district court, who shall examine the same, and cause such clerks to subscribe an oath to the correctness of each and every item in such statement. If the judge approves such statement as correct, he shall indorse his approval thereon in writing, and the clerk shall thereupon transmit said statement to the Attorney-General. The clerks of the circuit and district courts, of the supreme and district courts of the Territories, and of the supreme court of the District of Columbia shall not receive annually exceeding $2,500 each for their services; and where one person is clerk of both the circuit and district courts, such clerk shall not receive for services in both capacities a sum exceeding $3,000 per annum, except the clerks of the district and circuit courts for the southern district of New York, who may each receive $3,500 annually for their services. From the fees and emoluments earned and so reported by such clerks no one of them shall be allowed an amount exceeding the maximum herein provided; and after deducting the payment of deputy clerks, of office expenses, and any other allowances authorized by the Attorney-General, the balance of such fees and emoluments, if any, over and above the said maximum amount, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States according to the provisions of section 844 of the Revised Statutes; which payments shall be ascertained at the Treasury Department upon quarterly returns to the First Auditor of all fees earned during each quarter, to be made under oath and approved by the court; and upon failure to make said quarterly and semi-annual reports within thirty days thereafter, the clerk shall be summarily removed by the judge, upon the request of the Attorney-General.

SEC. 10. That the judges of the circuit and district courts of the United States and the judges of the Territorial courts shall divide each district into commissioners' districts, consisting of one or more counties or parishes, and they shall appoint one or more United States commissioners in each commissioner's district, as may be required for the efficient and economical execution of the laws. Such commissioners shall have jurisdiction only of such offenses as are committed in their respective districts, except in cases of change of venue or where no qualified commissioner resides in the commissioner's district where the offense was committed who is in the district and physically able to perform his duties, and except also in cases of offenses against the postal laws of the United States, in which the jurisdiction shall remain as now provided by law.

United States commissioners shall receive for their services such fees as are now allowed by law, except that in all criminal cases heard by them they shall only be allowed $1 for issuing process to arrest and $1 for a recognizance or bond for court, including affidavits of justification of sureties and acknowledgments; and for all other writs and processes issued, for all oaths administered, for docketing, hearing, and trying the same, and for all services performed the sum of $5, and no more, for each case; but where two or more charges are preferred not requiring separate trials against any person at the same time, the commissioner shall be allowed only for a fee in one case. In preliminary examinations, where there is probable cause of guilt, the commissioner shall bind over the accused, if he shall give the bail required, to appear for trial before the court in his district which may be held nearest the place where the offense was committed; and if he can not give the required bail, the commissioner shall commit him for trial to the nearest jail where such prisoners can be safely and economically kept, and shall in both cases transmit all the papers in the case to the clerk of the United States court to be held in said district nearest the place where the offense was committed at which court grand juries are impaneled, and the clerk shall notify the district attorney thereof; but any accused person who may be committed in default of bail may, upon the order of the judge, be removed to and tried at that place in the judicial district where the court will be held next after his commitment.

Justices of the peace shall receive the same fees as United States commissioners for services in criminal cases. Their accounts shall be verified by oath and forwarded to the United States attorney of the district, to be submitted to the court for approval.

It shall be the duty of commissioners and justices of the peace to examine and certify to the marshal for payment bills of witnesses for transportation and attendance.

The judges of the Territorial courts, United States district attorneys, and United States marshals and their deputies, when required to use any public conveyance in the discharge of their respective duties, shall be allowed the actual amount paid for transportation, not exceeding the usual fares on such public conveyance, and no more. All accounts rendered for such transportation shall be verified by oath of the person making the same; and he shall state in such oath that he did not use for any part of such transportation a pass or pay a less fare than that stated in the account.

Accounts for the transportation of prisoners and guards by public conveyances shall be rendered for such sum as was actually paid for such transportation, not exceeding the usual fare; and vouchers verified by oath shall in all cases accompany such accounts.

SEC. 11. That United States marshals shall hereafter be allowed their actual expenses in the following cases, namely:

For transporting prisoners in any State or Territory, or from one State or Territory to another, on any public conveyance, the amount actually paid for transportation of themselves and for each prisoner and necessary guard, but not exceeding the usual fares. Where free transportation is used no charge whatever shall be made or allowed. If reduced transportation is secured, this fact shall be stated, and the actual amount paid shall be charged in the account, and no more.

The amount actually and necessarily paid for meals of themselves, prisoners, and necessary guards while in transitu, not exceeding 50 cents per meal.

The amount actually paid deputy marshals and guards for their services, not exceeding $2 per day.

For travel in going to serve or returning from serving any process, warrant, attachment, or other writ, including writs or subpœna in civil or criminal cases, the actual amount paid for transportation on all public conveyances, and no more, the account to be stated as in case of transporting criminals; and for each mile actually traveled to serve any such process as aforesaid where there is no public conveyance, 10 cents per mile going and returning.

For all travel required of them by law on any public conveyance they shall be allowed, in all States and Territories, the actual amount paid, as herein provided, and no more; and for every mile actually traveled where there is no public conveyance, 10 cents per mile each way.

All allowances for travel by public conveyance and meals are not to be construed as compensation, but as reimbursements for actual and necessary expenditures in the discharge of official duties; and all transportation provided for in this act shall be computed by the nearest practicable route.

All allowances for mileage and transportation on public conveyances in excess of the amount actually paid are hereby declared illegal; and no credit shall be allowed to any of the disbursing officers of the United States for payments or allowances in violation of the provisions of this act. An affidavit that the account is just and true in all respects, and that the expenses charged therein were actually and necessarily incurred, must accompany each bill. In all cases the account must contain the items of expenditure. The Attorney-General shall prescribe forms, rules, and regulations for presenting all accounts of court officials, to all of which forms shall be attached the oaths to be taken and subscribed.

SEC. 12. That hereafter jurors and witnesses in all of the States and Territories shall receive their actual and necessary expenditures for transportation when using any public conveyance, in lieu of mileage, but not exceeding the usual fares; and when there are no public conveyances they shall receive the mileage now allowed by law for travel to and from court; and witnesses shall receive $1.50 a day, and jurors shall receive $2 a day during actual attendance at any court or courts and for the time necessarily occupied in going to and returning from the same.

SEC. 13. That the provisions of this act shall apply to all the States and Territories and to the District of Columbia.

All acts or parts of acts granting double or increased fees to marshals, deputy marshals, clerks, or district attorneys, in any State or Territory, are hereby repealed, and the general laws prescribing fees are hereby re-enacted as to such States and Territories, except as herein modified or amended.

That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after the 30th day of June, 1884, except that those portions relating to the appointment, jurisdiction, and compensation of commissioners and deputy marshals shall take effect thirty days after the passage of this act. And all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. BISBEE. I make a point of order against the entire amendment upon the following grounds: First, that it contains subject-matter not germane to the pending bill; second, that it does not on its face retrench expenditures; and third, that it is obnoxious to clause 4 of Rule XXI, which provides that no bill or resolution shall at any time be amended by annexing thereto or incorporating therewith the substance of any other bill or resolution pending before the House.

I shall assume that the subject-matter of this proposed amendment is well understood. I desire briefly to call the attention of the Chair to the new legislation which it contains. It proposes to vest in the Attorney-General very large additional powers. On page 6 of the proposed amendment is a provision to vest in the Attorney-General the power to determine under what circumstances a United States marshal shall have a chief deputy or a clerk. Under existing law the marshal appoints his own chief deputy as well as his general deputy.

The amendment further provides that the Attorney-General shall provide a uniform system of book-keeping and returns, and shall furnish books and blanks for this purpose to the United States marshals; and the sum of $10,000 is appropriated to execute that provision of the proposed amendment. To that extent expenditures are increased upon the face of the amendment.

On page 8 of the amendment it is proposed to authorize the Attorney-General to appoint all the marshals, clerks, chief deputies, and other deputies, upon the recommendation of the marshals of the respective districts.

That, Mr. Speaker, is not germane to any portion of the bill under consideration. It proposes to grant the Attorney-General new and distinct powers, and I think very improper powers. It will not be denied that the marshal can now appoint his own clerks and deputies; and I think it will be generally agreed that he should at all times have the power to do so.

Again, section 4, page 8, goes on to provide—

That deputy marshals shall be appointed in the manner provided in the foregoing section for such localities in the district as the judge of the district or circuit courts may authorize and require for the efficient transaction of the business of the United States courts of such districts in each locality, but their powers shall not be limited by the locality for which they are appointed.

There, Mr. Speaker, is another very material amendment to the existing law. Under existing law the discretion is left with the marshal to appoint as many deputies as in his judgment are necessary for the efficient transaction of the business of the court. This amendment proposes to leave that matter to the discretion of the court itself.

The amendment goes on further and provides the qualifications of such deputies. It also makes material changes in the existing law with reference to the service of process or writs.

Again, in section 6, page 10, there is a very material change in the law. It is there provided that circuit and district courts shall be the judges of the emergency which may make it necessary to appoint an additional regular deputy.

In brief, the point is that this amendment proposes to grant not only to the Attorney-General but also to the circuit and district courts largely-increased and very important and responsible powers, no portion of which has, in my humble opinion, any relevancy whatever to the bill under discussion or is germane to it in any sense. There are other provisions of the bill liable to objection upon the same ground, which I will not read.

My last ground of objection, Mr. Speaker, is that there is another bill, there are two other bills, pending before committees of this House involving the same subject-matter. I refer to the distinct and separate bills providing for salaries of district attorneys and United States marshals. I have not those bills before me and can not now give their numbers; but it will not be denied that such bills have been introduced and referred to appropriate committees and are now under consideration by such committees.

I also call attention, Mr. Speaker, to a paragraph on page 225 of the Digest:

Whenever any portion of a proposition reported or submitted is out of order (either as an entirety or by way of amendment) it is sufficient ground for the rejection of the entire proposition.

I think it is perfectly clear that several parts of this amendment, particularly those parts clothing the Department of Justice with additional powers, enlarging the jurisdiction of the district and circuit courts, and depriving the United States marshals of authority which they now have under existing law, are not germane to this bill and ought not to be permitted to come in by way of amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. BISBEE] bases his point of order upon three grounds, which I will dispose of in the order in which they have been stated. The first is that there are in this amendment certain provisions not germane to the subject-matter of the bill. In this position I do not agree with the gentleman. In the first place this amendment is an appropriation for the expenses of certain officers, district attorneys, marshals, &c., and these legislative provisions all relate to those officers. Of course they are germane to the subject-matter.

Mr. CHACE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. CHACE. Is it not a fact that these fees which this amendment proposes to legislate out of existence are paid by the parties litigant, not by the Government?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir; they are paid by the United States.

Mr. CHACE. I think the great majority of them are paid by the parties.

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir; these are all fees paid by the Government for Government business, and there are appropriations here to pay them. The amounts appropriated are for sums to be expended by the United States in criminal prosecutions in which the Government is a party. It is true that if we reduce the fees for service of subpœnas in civil as well as criminal cases the litigants in civil suits will of course get the benefit of the reduction. But the change is made here because the Government pays such fees in cases in which it is a party.

Mr. BISBEE. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BISBEE. I did not before state, but I intended to make the point, that the committee from which this amendment is reported has no authority over such a matter. I make that point now so that the gentleman may have the benefit of it.

Mr. SPRINGER. All right.

The next ground on which this point of order rests is that the proposed amendment embodies the substance of two bills now pending in this House. All I have to say on this point is that if there are two bills pending in the House embodying the substance of this amendment I have not read those bills and do not know from the reading of them what they contain. If I have incorporated, therefore, the substance of any other bill in this proposition I do not know it. I am sure it can not be so with reference to the bill in relation to the salaries of marshals and district attorneys. The bill which has been indicated is not the substance of this amendment and it is not bottomed upon it, as I have never read that bill and could not have incorporated the substance of it here.

Mr. BISBEE. I can tell the gentleman what they are, if he wishes.

Mr. SPRINGER. I prefer to have the text of the bill itself and not any statement as to its substance. If the gentleman has the text of the bill and will hand it to me I will look at it.

The amendment must embody the substance of the other bill. It is not as to their being on the same subject to which the rule is directed, but it must be the substance of the other bill.

As to the question whether the committee has jurisdiction of the matter, I will state in answer to that that under the rules of the House the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice is required to act on the very subject-matter covered by this substitute; and also at the beginning of this session the subject was referred specifically to the committee of which I am chairman by that part of the President's message relating to court expenses. But as an individual I would have had the right to offer it, and then it would be subject to some additional points of order. It comes under the general jurisdiction of the committee under the rules of the House, and besides has been specially referred in the President's message, which recommended to be done that which the committee has reported. I will read from that message of the President:

So, too, should the laws which regulate the compensation of district attorneys and marshals. They should be paid wholly by salaries, instead of in part by fees, as is now the case.

The change would prove to be a measure of economy, and would discourage the institution of needless and oppressive legal proceedings, which, it is to be feared, have in some instances been conducted for the mere sake of personal gain.

This proposition was referred to the committee on the recommendation of the President this should be done. Report was made on that reference.

Now, as to the question of legislation. Of course, Mr. Speaker, this is new legislation. The rule is not directed against new legislation, but that new legislation must be germane to the subject and must retrench expenditures.

First, it is in order by coming from the committee of which I am chairman. Now, does it retrench expenditures? To show it does I have only to refer to the amount appropriated in the bill. And allow me to say here that the Committee on Appropriations I believe were agreed this substitute should be proposed. They are in favor of it so far as I know, and therefore did not prepare that portion of the bill I move to strike out with a view of having it remain as an appropriation bill for this purpose, but merely for the purpose, as I understand, that this amendment might take the place of it. Hence, in order to determine the actual amount of reduction this bill provides, you are to look to the expense which this committee is bound to appropriate for, and it appropriates less by several hundred thousand dollars than the face of the bill. So if the amendment is not received the bill must be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations in order that it may take time to prepare a provision on this subject which will embrace all the items.

On page 12 of the report which this committee submitted, number 1779, the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations prepared a table which is here printed. It shows that the amounts appropriated and the deficiencies which must be supplied and have been supplied in the deficiency bill will amount to $3,318,800. The amounts appropriated in this bill for the ensuing year amount to $2,799,000. This shows a reduction of $519,000 for the ensuing year below the actual expenses of the courts for the current year.

The gentleman has pointed out provisions of legislation here which he says are obnoxious to the rule. As to the appointment of deputy marshals and several others pointed out, the law as it stands provides the machinery for incurring court expenses and authorizes the expenditure provided for the current year of $3,300,000. In order to be enabled to reduce the appropriations for this service it was incumbent upon the committee to reduce the machinery under existing law by which these large expenditures have been incurred in the past. This is just what the legislation here proposes to do and nothing else. Every provision can be traced to a proposition which reduces and changes the machinery authorizing these unlimited expenditures.

It does reduce expenditures. The President has said in his message to Congress that if a bill of this kind should be reported it would be a measure of economy. The Attorney-General has also furnished a letter to the committee in which he states it would be a measure of great economy to adopt these provisions of legislation. But in addition to that the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman is convinced it would be not only a measure of economy but one of justice to the people of this country. And that economy will appear more clearly hereafter even than it does upon the terms of the bill itself. During the whole winter we have been engaged in an investigation as to the manner of the incurrence of these various expenses in the past, and have intimation of great abuses which have occurred in the expenses of the courts all over the country.

This legislation provides a remedy in the judgment of the committee, and they believe that it is within the rule, as providing such changes in the machinery of the courts by which these various expenses are incurred as will enable the Government to be run upon the sum here suggested, namely, more than half a million dollars less than the sum it has heretofore cost. That will be the result, if these changes are made, in our judgment.

Now, of course it must be apparent that you can not apply to each item of this appropriation bill the particular legislation without making a great confusion. It was therefore suggested that the appropriations should follow one after the other in the substitute, which they do, and after these expenses were provided for there should then come the legislative provisions which were necessary in order to make it possible to have the appropriations and make the changes provided therein.

It may be objected by some that so much legislation should not be put upon an appropriation bill. I concede that to be true if it were upon any other subject-matter. But in this particular case it must be regarded as an exception.

We are changing the manner of providing for the payment of the services of United States marshals, United States attorneys, and clerks of the United States courts. Now, if you change the manner of making payments you must change also the manner of making the appropriations for that service, and that change can only take place simultaneously with the bill itself.

There is no other mode by which you can accomplish the result, and hence the necessity for doing it on an appropriation bill, and the same bill which makes the change. For my own part I should have preferred a separate measure, but if you inject this legislation into the next year's appropriation you can make all harmonize with the new appropriation, and all of the machinery of the courts will be based upon the change which is found necessary. Here it will be in harmony strictly with the appropriation made, and will save the amount of money specified in the report of the committee.

In view of these facts, and after a most careful and thorough consideration of every item contained in the appropriation, I am of the opinion that it is not obnoxious to the point of order, and that it should be overruled.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman upon one point which he has not touched. The gentleman makes an argument to show that the adoption of the proposed substitute would retrench expenditures. But it has always been held, the Chair thinks, that in order to bring a proposed amendment within the rule, so as to admit it, it must be shown upon the face of the amendment itself, as compared with the bill to which it is offered as an amendment, that it does retrench expenditures. In other words, it is not sufficient to show as a matter of argument that it will ultimately result in a saving of expenditures. It must appear upon the face of the amendment itself that it is a saving of expenditures.

Now, the gentleman has not stated how much is appropriated in that part of the bill proposed to be stricken out, nor has he stated how much is proposed by the substitute; and there is nothing upon the face of the bill or the substitute to show, except by adding together the various items contained in each, which the Chair has not had an opportunity of doing.

Mr. SPRINGER. I supposed that the Committee on Appropriations did make their bill correspond with the expenditures of the current year, and hence based the estimate which appears upon the report of the committee upon the actual expenditures of the current year, which would be decreased some $500,000 if the substitute should be adopted. But I have been informed that the Committee on Appropriations took each item appropriated here when they were considering the appropriations they would make and added $10,000 to each, so that the Chair will perceive each item of the substitute has been decreased $10,000 as compared with the bill, and the amount covered by the bill is just that much greater than the substitute. That was done with a view to make it in order to move this substitute by the Committee on Appropriations, and merely as a formal amendment coming from them. The substitute would reduce the amount covered by the bill something like $60,000, I think, on its face.

Mr. FORNEY. One hundred and sixty thousand dollars.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am informed by the gentleman from Alabama that it would be a reduction of $160,000 in the aggregate amount appropriated by the bill. But the amount is actually much greater if you shall be compelled to recommit the bill, according to the amount of the current year's expenses. If you reject this substitute the expenditure would be $500,000 greater, which would have to come into the bill afterward. But $160,000 is the difference in the amounts covered by the bill. That is simply nominal however, as I have said, and was put in by the Appropriations Committee themselves that it might be more than was appropriated by this substitute, so as to make it in order.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. The amount of the saving is not material, provided it does reduce the expenditures, in order to bring it within the rule.

Mr. SPRINGER. No, it is not material; for any reduction would bring it within the rule, although on the face of the bill I think it is $160,000, while in reality it is much greater.

Mr. BISBEE. I have obtained the bills to which I referred in my argument. They were introduced and referred to the Judiciary Committee, and can be examined by the Chair. There are two separate bills introduced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT]. One relates exclusively to the fees of United States marshals of all the States and all the Territories, and relates also to the fees of deputy marshals. The other bill is exclusively with reference to the pay of district attorneys. There is still another bill, introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK], which covers the compensation both of marshals and United States attorneys.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is utterly impossible to reach the conclusion that this amendment would retrench expenditures. There are certain officers whose appointments depend upon the discretion of the Department of Justice. Certain clerks and certain deputies are appointed by the Attorney-General, and within certain limits the number to be appointed rests in his discretion. They are paid a certain salary; some of them a fixed salary; others, salaries to be determined by the Attorney-General himself. Therefore it is utterly impossible to say, notwithstanding this amendment may appropriate a little less money than the bill itself—it is impossible to say that the obligation that may be incurred under this amendment will be less than under existing law.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I call attention to section 10 of this bill. That section provides—

That the judges of the circuit and district courts of the United States and the judges of the Territorial courts shall divide each district into commissioners' districts, consisting of one or more counties or parishes, and they shall appoint one or more United States commissioners in each commissioner's district as may be required for the efficient and economical execution of the laws.

The section further provides, which I shall not read, what the jurisdiction of those commissioners shall be. Here is a new law granting to the district and circuit courts not only new and distinct powers which they do not now possess, but also the very considerable and important power of defining the Territorial jurisdiction of these commissioners.

I would like to have the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] or any other gentleman point out what part of the bill reported from the Committee on Appropriations has anything on this subject; or, in other words, in what respect section 10 of this bill is germane to the pending bill reported from the Committee on Appropriations.

I will not dwell further on the point of order. The gentleman from Illinois has not been able to show, and it seems to me utterly impossible to show that these several sections taking away power from the United States marshals and granting additional powers to the district and circuit courts and to the judges thereof and to the Attorney-General can in any possible way be germane to this bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. In regard to the commissioners the bill appropriates $110,000, and the substitute $100,000; actually it is less than that. In order that the commissioners should not incur the large expenses they have heretofore incurred, the provision was inserted limiting their jurisdiction to particular localities, so that there would not be the vast amount of costs that have heretofore been incurred. And, further, it provides they shall have so much allowance in each case instead of an allowance per day. I think, according to the practice, they have tried one case a day, running up large bills of costs in each case. According to the investigations of our committee, instead of $15 and $20 commissioner's fees in each case, the amount would be reduced to seven or eight dollars. And it was to cut away the old machinery, and get a system that would cost less, that the committee have proposed this change.

Now, as to this being the substance of pending bills, the gentleman from Florida has handed me, in the first place, the bill of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] which covers ten printed pages and classifies marshals in every State of the Union. It is a very long and elaborate bill on the subject of marshals' pay. This bill is not the substance of that bill in any sense whatever. The other bill is that of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] for the compensation of United States marshals, the House bill No. 1498. It provides—

That from and after July 1, 1884, the compensation allowed United States marshals shall be an annual salary of $3,500, &c.

That is not the substance of this bill at all in any sense of the word. There is nothing, therefore, on that ground for the point of order.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Illinois send those bills up to the Chair?

Mr. HERBERT. The bills are long, and it would take the Speaker some time to examine them. Before he looks into them I desire his attention to the difference between this proposed amendment and each of those bills.

In the first place, the bill relating to the abolishing of salaries of marshals introduced by myself proposes simply to abolish fees of marshals in all cases in which the United States is a party. That is as far as the bill goes. This amendment proposes to abolish all fees, the fee system entirely, so far as marshals are concerned. In relation to the compensation there is a similar difference. Not only are the amounts of the bill introduced by myself and in the amendment proposed here by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice different in very many cases, but they proceed upon entirely different principles. The bill introduced by myself proposes to compensate them for everything and made no allowance to them whatever for transportation. The amendment of the committee proposes to allow them transportation from court to court and from their homes to the court. I think that is all I need say in relation to that bill.

The bill in relation to the salaries of district attorneys also proceeds upon a different idea. In my bill, which the gentleman from Florida has referred to—and so far as I have been able to look at it the bill of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] I think will be found on examination to be a copy of mine—the bill introduced by myself proposes to abolish the fee system, it is true, so far as district attorneys are concerned. In that point the bill and amendment are similar. But a bill that simply went to that extent and no further, that provided no more of compensation, would be, to say the least of it, incomplete. It would be ruinous. It would pro hac vice put a stop to the operation of the Government if you provided no mode of compensation.

The compensation fixed in my bill is in lieu of everything else, making an allowance for transportation from court to court or from home to court. I call your attention to these fundamental differences simply. There are many other differences between these bills and the proposed amendment. I think I need not go any further than to say that this amendment is not substantially the same in any part of it as either of these bills, so far as the rule is concerned.

I think that the test of the matter might be made in this way: would the one bill and the other necessarily command the support of the same legislators? A member might be willing to vote for the one, where the fixed compensation was in lieu of everything, and not vote in favor of the other. But I will not dwell on this branch of the matter further, for it seems to me that I have answered completely the objection on that point.

In relation to the question whether the proposed amendment will reduce expenditures, I know that the rule is that the amendment must on its face appear to reduce expenditures. But what is meant by the expression "on its face?" Suppose, Mr. Speaker, that you were a judge, and that I demurred to pleadings; the substance of my demurrer being that the plea or complaint to which I demurred was defective on its face. How are you to arrive at a conclusion? How are you to decide that the plea is defective for the reason which I give? If you are a judge, you are necessarily remitted to what you know judicially; that is, to the law bearing upon such a case upon the point raised by me.

So by analogy when the question is whether the amendment on its face reduces expenditures, one mode of determining the question is to look at it as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has done, to see if the amount proposed in the amendment is less than the amount proposed in the bill. But another way is to bring to mind those things which you, not judicially, but I will use an equivalent term, which you officially know.

Now, I think you as Speaker of this House, and all the members of this House, whether in point of fact they do actually know what were the expenditures of this Department of the Government last year, are presumed to know it, just as a judge, although he may not know the law that is in the books, is presumed to know it. We have here published documents, published by our order, published for our information. They are always officially before us, and we do officially know that the expenditures for the items embraced in this amendment were last year under the old system many tens of thousands of dollars greater than they would be under the new system here proposed. If so, then the point of order is not well taken on that ground.

The gentleman has pointed out several paragraphs here to which he takes exception. He raised his objection to the whole amendment. Now, the whole amendment itself is a system, and he can not take a line or a half a line, a paragraph or a half a paragraph, and say that that line or that paragraph is not germane, or does not within itself reduce expenditures. That line or that paragraph to which he objects must be taken into consideration together with the whole amendment. If the whole amendment is germane, and if the whole amendment does, as this undoubtedly does, whether tested by either rule, retrench expenditures, then the point of order is well taken.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, let us have the ruling of the Chair. That is all the speech I wish to make.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read clause 3 of Rule XXI, which seems to be the most important clause in connection with this question.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill: Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

The SPEAKER. There is no question but what the proposed amendment will change existing law. Still, if it is germane to the subject-matter of the bill and retrenches expenditures it is in order, unless it be out of order for the other reason stated by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BISBEE], that it is the substance of another bill, or of other bills, now pending before the House. Those other bills have been sent to the Speaker's desk and have been examined by the Chair as carefully as the limited time allowed him would permit.

It is also true that the proposed substitute embraces some of the provisions contained in the pending bills. For instance, it abolishes fees heretofore paid to United States marshals and substitutes salaries in lieu of them, which is the same thing done in the bill introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK], although the amounts are different. There are also one or two provisions similar to those contained in the bill introduced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT]. But the Chair thinks that under the rule the fact that an amendment offered embraces one or possibly more features of some other bill pending is not sufficient of itself to exclude it. It must contain the substance of the pending bill in order to make it objectionable under the rule.

So far as the Chair has been able to give this matter consideration he is not able to see that the proposed amendment does contain the substance of the other bills or the substance of either of them.

While it is true that the proposed amendment will change existing law, it is also true, as the Chair believes, that it will retrench expenditures. When the Chair is called upon to decide whether or not an amendment upon its face retrenches expenditures, which seems to be the rule heretofore followed, he must of course compare the provisions of the amendment with the existing law, if there be one, making permanent appropriations for the purpose stated, or in the absence of any existing law making such appropriations he must compare it with the appropriation proposed to be made in the bill to which the amendment is offered.

In this case there is no statute making permanent appropriations for these purposes. Therefore the Chair must compare the provisions of the amendment with the provisions of the bill for the purpose of determining whether or not there is a reduction of expenditures. The Chair supposes that there is such a reduction from the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], as well as from the statement made by a member of the Committee on Appropriations, which have not been controverted, that the amendment appropriates about $160,000 less than the amendment proposed to be appropriated in the bill as reported.

Then, is the amendment germane? It certainly relates to the same subject-matter to which the bill relates; that is, the compensation of attorneys, commissioners, marshals, deputy marshals, clerks, and other officers of the United States courts.

It may be that there is some new legislation in the amendment which is not actually necessary in order to effectuate the reduction of expenditures; but upon such an examination as the Chair has been able to give it appears that all the new legislation in regard to the duties of these officers in the discharge of their official functions is just such legislation as is necessary to accomplish the reduction of expenditures.

If upon the reading of this substitute by sections it should appear that there is some section or clause changing existing law and not necessary to accomplish the retrenchment of expenditures, a point of order might still be made against that part of the amendment. It is true that where any part of an amendment, which is an entirety, is out of order, the whole amendment is out of order. But where an amendment embraces various distinct propositions, each of which is complete in itself, the fact that some one of those propositions may be out of order does not exclude all the other provisions of the amendment. It is only where the different provisions are necessarily dependent one upon another that the rule excluding the whole amendment applies. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order made against the amendment as a whole.

Mr. RANDALL. I now ask that an agreement be made to fix 5 o'clock as the hour at which the vote shall be taken on this amendment, and such amendments as may be offered to it and on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes that at 5 o'clock the previous question shall be ordered on this amendment, upon such other amendments as may be offered, and upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. KEIFER. It may happen that some amendments which we desire to submit can not be offered by 5 o'clock. I do not know that anybody wishes to extend the debate.

Mr. RANDALL. I thought I was proposing this arrangement with the assent of the gentleman.

Mr. KEIFER. We do assent; but we do not want to be cut off from offering amendments. So far as debate is concerned I do not want to occupy any time at all.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I wish to inquire whether this amendment will be read by paragraphs so as to give opportunity for offering amendments.

Mr. RANDALL. So far as I am concerned I do not wish to cut off any amendments. But I want to cut off debate.

Mr. KEIFER. We have no objection.

Several MEMBERS. Let us vote now.

Mr. RANDALL. I want the House to vote on such amendments as may be submitted, so as to get the proposition in the best possible shape and in entire harmony with the voice of the whole House.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I believe in this amendment. I think it as a whole a very excellent one. But I believe that the salary which it proposes to allow to the district attorney for the district of Indiana is too low by $500. I would like to move an amendment to make the salary of this officer $3,500.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to allowing any amendment to be voted upon.

Mr. HAMMOND. I suggest that by unanimous consent general debate be now closed and the amendment be read by paragraphs.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to that. But I want to cut off all debate—general and under the five-minute rule—at 5 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Is it understood that the Clerk shall read this amendment by sections?

Mr. HAMMOND. I ask unanimous consent that general debate be considered as closed now.

The SPEAKER. General debate was closed.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think there is no necessity for any general debate.

The SPEAKER. None is asked for.

A MEMBER. And none is in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think we can reach a conclusion upon this question by 5 o'clock, if we proceed at once to vote upon amendments, allowing brief explanations as we go on. But I do not think it necessary that the whole of this substitute should be again read. If there are any amendments to be offered let them be offered now.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have my proposition submitted. I desire the previous question, so as to close debate at 5 o'clock, not to cut off any amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. Suppose the gentleman allows the matter to run along without fixing any limitation just now. There is perfect good faith on this side of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I believe that nine-tenths of the House will vote for the amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. Suppose the gentleman allows the matter to run on for five or ten minutes. When amendments are offered let brief explanations be made and votes be taken, even if the proceeding should go a little beyond the hour of 5 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The only way to limit debate on these amendments will be by ordering the previous question, and that can be done on each amendment whenever desired.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to close debate at 5 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania gives notice he will close debate at 5 o'clock.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move we dispense with the reading of the bill by sections and let gentlemen propose their amendments and we can then act on them in their order.

The SPEAKER. If that is satisfactory the Chair will now recognize gentlemen to offer their amendments. The Chair hears no objection. They will be considered in order.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. I have an amendment to offer to the third section.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen who have amendments to the first section will be recognized first.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I move, in line 4, page 4, after the word "eastern," to insert the word "western;" and in line 6 to strike out "Western Pennsylvania." I offer that amendment for the purpose of making the salary of the marshal of the western district of Pennsylvania the same as that of the marshal of the eastern district. He does as much work, has as much labor to perform, and should be paid the same salary.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is one of the amendments I have offered, and I will only supplement what my colleague has said by saying that he does more work, as is shown by the records.

Mr. RANDALL. The Attorney-General recommends it shall be the way it is here.

Mr. SPRINGER. We thought that the city of Philadelphia with all its maritime jurisdiction imposed upon the marshal, he ought to have a larger salary. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The House divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 72.

So Mr. MILLER'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out these words:

Southern district of New York, $6,000; Northern New York, Massachusetts, Eastern Pennsylvania, District of Columbia, Southern Ohio, and California, $5,000 each; Maryland, Western Pennsylvania, Eastern Missouri, Kentucky, Northern Ohio, Northern and Southern Illinois, Eastern Louisiana, Kansas, and Western Texas, $4,000 each; New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Delaware, Nevada, Southern Florida, Connecticut, Northern Mississippi, and Southern Mississippi, $2,000 each; and all other marshals shall be paid a salary of $3,000 a year.

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

Southern district of New York, $4,000; Northern New York, Massachusetts, Eastern Pennsylvania, District of Columbia, Southern Ohio, and California, Maryland, Western Pennsylvania, Eastern Missouri, Kentucky, Northern Ohio, Northern and Southern Illinois, Eastern Louisiana, Kansas, and Western Texas, $3,500 each; New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Delaware, Nevada, Southern Florida, Connecticut, Northern Mississippi, and Southern Mississippi, $2,000 each; and all other marshals shall be paid a salary of $2,500 a year.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to the fact that as the bill stands now you will pay the marshals of the Territories $400 more than you pay the governors.

Mr. SPRINGER. How much?

Mr. HOLMAN. Four hundred dollars more. The salary of the governor of a Territory is $2,600, while that of the marshal is $3,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is it not true that in one case the man's time is all taken, and in the other it is not? One is dress parade and the other is business. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. You pay a judge of the Territory $3,000, and the marshal is paid the same salary. My proposition is that the highest salary shall be $4,000 for the southern district of New York; that the more important districts after that shall be $3,500, and that the smaller districts shall be $2,500, and the latter would embrace my own. These are salaries in harmony with the generally large and ample salaries paid by the Federal Government. And I hope the House will not at the outset in abandoning the fee system adopt the extravagant salaries of the substitute of my friend from Illinois. I trust economy will be regarded in allowing reasonable compensation to these employés of the Government. It is not necessary I should urge on gentlemen on this side of the House to put these salaries at a reasonable rate; and I submit those I propose are ample and beyond the range of those paid in my own State for corresponding service.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 41; noes 83.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope my friend will not make that point.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will not come then with such extravagant salaries.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. SPRINGER were appointed as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 41, noes 127.

So the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN was rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN. In the third line of this section 2 I move to amend by striking out "six" and inserting "five;" so that it will read:

Southern district of New York, $5,000.

The question was taken.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 36, noes 113.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not press the point of no quorum, though I regret to see an increase of salary placed upon an appropriation bill in the absence of a quorum. I will move now to strike out in line 6, page 4 of this bill, the word "five" and insert "four;" so that it will read:

Southern New York, Massachusetts, Eastern Pennsylvania, District of Columbia, Southern Ohio, and California, $4,000 each.

The question was taken.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 21, noes 118.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. SPRINGER and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported –ayes 24, noes 156.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move to insert in line 8, page 4, after the word "Illinois," the word "Indiana." That will put the salary of the marshal for the State of Indiana in the four-thousand-dollar class. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] Allow me to say it is by the proposed amendment fixed only at $3,000. Indiana is a judicial district, and there is but one judicial district in the State. That State contains a population of over 2,000,000 people. The district court is held at four different places: at the city of Fort Wayne, at Indianapolis, at Evansville, and at New Albany. It certainly does more business than the southern district of Illinois and a number of others which are included in the four-thousand-dollar class by this substitute. I believe in the principle of this amendment——

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether the bill itself does not give a deputy to the marshal at each of these places at a salary of $1,000 per annum.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do not know as to that.

Mr. RANDALL. I think it does.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I have not examined in regard to that point; but the fees of the marshal of that district now amount to $6,000 a year, and this is a reduction of 50 per cent. While I believe that the fees system is debauching to public and political morals and indorse most heartily the idea of making all of these officers salaried officers of the Government, I think we ought at least to give a just compensation to these men, and $4,000 compensation to the marshal of the State of Indiana is not certainly more than enough.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to say to the gentleman from Indiana, in response to his remarks, that nearly every salary in this substitute is a reduction, no matter what others may say; and that we are not raising salaries at all by the adoption of the substitute.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I have not so intimated. But it is fixed here in Southern Illinois at $4,000. Now, I think the salary of the marshal for the district of Indiana should certainly be equal to that.

Mr. RANDALL. I am not making that statement with a view of reflecting upon what the gentleman from Indiana says, but I am only saying it for the purpose of defending the point, or answering an intimation that salaries have been increased in some places. I repeat that there is no increase, but on the contrary a reduction of salaries by this substitute.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Justice to Indiana demands this increase, and I hope it will be granted.

The question was taken; and the Speaker decided that by the sound the noes prevailed.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do not want to delay proceedings, but I shall ask a division on this vote.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 77, noes 87.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. STRUBLE. I wish to offer as an amendment to this section that which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 8, of section 2, after the word "Kansas," the word "Iowa."

Mr. STRUBLE. I wish to say simply that there are two districts in Iowa, the northern and southern districts. The courts are held in three places in each district. I therefore ask the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the previous question upon the section and all amendments now pending.

Mr. KEIFER. Does the gentleman propose to cut off amendments to be offered?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not want to prevent the offering of amendments, but simply to close debate.

Mr. KEIFER. We want to offer some additional amendments in good faith.

Mr. McCOID. I desire to say a word on this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] demands the previous question upon the section and the pending amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE].

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of New York. I desire to offer an amendment to this section.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered on the section. Are there any amendments to be proposed to the third section?

Mr. KEIFER. I move to amend by inserting in line 7, page 6 of the bill, after the words "District of Columbia," the words "Northern Ohio," so that it will read "Northern Ohio, Southern Ohio," &c.

I desire to say a single word. This clause of section 3 provides that for the marshal's clerk and chief deputy the salary shall be $1,800 each in certain districts named. The district of Northern Ohio includes the cities of Cleveland, Toledo, Sandusky, and others along Lake Erie. It is the more important of the two districts of Ohio; and it is the one where the most business is done of a maritime kind. It is as large as the southern district. I live in the southern district and have no interest except to equalize these matters. Courts are held at Cleveland and at Toledo, and it is necessary to keep up a double establishment for a marshal's office. This is simply putting the northern with the larger business of the two on a par with the southern district.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to say that if I am not mistaken the whole of this scheme of salaries has been fixed after an examination of the receipts for ten years of the various offices throughout the country.

Mr. KEIFER. This relates to the clerks of marshals, not to the marshals themselves.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. McCOID. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 3, line 7, after the word "Kentucky," insert the word "Iowa."

Mr. McCOID. Mr. Speaker, Iowa is in the eighth circuit, which is composed of eight States. That State does 33.4 per cent. of the whole business of that whole circuit of eight States. In that circuit is Kansas; and when the committee provided a salary for marshals they put Kansas in the list of $4,000 salaries and left Iowa unmentioned, which brings it into the class of $3,000 salaries. That shows that the committee did not consider this question upon the amount of business done for the last ten years. If the committee had fixed the salaries of marshals upon the business done they would not have put Kansas in the $4,000 class and Iowa in the $3,000 class, because Iowa does 33 per cent. of the business of the whole eight States.

For that reason I say the amendment voted upon a few moments ago in reference to the salaries of marshals was not properly and justly treated. That amendment offered by my colleague ought to have been adopted. And now I say, in order to remedy that defect in the bill in some measure, we should put Iowa in this list of salaries of $1,800 for deputies and clerks. That will compensate, in some measure, for the other amendment not having been adopted. There are in that district three places where each marshal must attend a court and do all the necessary business connected with the court. I appeal to the House to give this amendment fair consideration, the other amendment not having been adopted.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. McCOID, there were—ayes 46, noes 88.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 3 by inserting after line 32 the following:

"Any person who steals, takes away, falsifies, mutilates, or otherwise alters, destroys, or conceals any book, record, or paper by law required to be in the custody of the marshal, or who counsels, aids, or abets such stealing, taking away, altering, falsifying, mutilating, destroying, or concealing of any such book, record, or paper, shall be guilty of a felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined not exceeding $1,000 or imprisoned at labor not exceeding three years, or both) in the discretion of the court."

Mr. RANDALL. That is right.

Mr. KEIFER. Is not that in the bill now?

The SPEAKER. It is not in the substitute as offered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I conceded that that was subject to the point of order and left it out.

The amendment of Mr. VAN ALSTYNE was agreed to.

Mr. HOPKINS. There is an amendment to section 3 which I sent up some time ago. I ask a vote upon it, although I presume I may as well accept the inevitable.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment of Mr. HOPKINS, as follows:

Insert in line 7, page 6, after the words "Eastern Pennsylvania," the words "Western Pennsylvania."

Mr. HOPKINS. The object of this amendment is to make the salary for Western Pennsylvania the same as for Eastern Pennsylvania.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move the previous question on the section.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Are there any amendments to the fourth section?

Mr. BISBEE. I desire to offer an amendment to section 3.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered on section 3.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. BISBEE. I do not think it is the intention of the gentleman in charge of the bill to cut off amendments. I supposed the object was only to cut off debate.

Mr. RANDALL. It was the House that did it, and not the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suggest that gentlemen have leave to print their amendments, with such remarks as they desire to make upon them.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move the previous question on sections 4, 5, and 6, as there are no amendments, I believe, to be offered on these.

The previous question was ordered.

The House then proceeded to consider section 7 of the amendment, the first paragraph of which is as follows:

SEC. 7. That district attorneys of the United States shall hereafter be paid monthly for their services the following annual salaries, in lieu of all fees, allowances, and salary now authorized by law: Southern New York, $8,000; Northern New York, Massachusetts, Eastern and Western Pennsylvania, District of Columbia, Northern and Southern Ohio, Eastern Missouri, Northern and Southern Illinois, and California, $5,000 each; Maryland, Kentucky, Kansas, Eastern Louisiana, Northern Georgia, Western Florida, and Western Texas, $4,000 each; New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Delaware, Nevada, Southern Florida, Connecticut, Northern Mississippi, and Southern Mississippi, $2,000 each; and all other United States district attorneys shall be paid each a salary of $3,000 a year.

Mr. HUNT. I move to strike out the words "Eastern Louisiana," after the words "Northern and Southern Ohio," and to insert the same words after "Western Missouri;" so as to transfer the district attorney for Eastern Louisiana from the four-thousand-dollar class to the five-thousand-dollar class.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BROADHEAD. I move to insert between the words "eastern" and "Missouri" the words "and western;" so as to provide that the district attorneys for the eastern and western districts of Missouri shall receive $5,000 each.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I move to amend by inserting after the word "Kansas" the words "southern district of Iowa;" so as to bring the district attorney for the southern district of Iowa into the four-thousand-dollar class. The last report of the Attorney-General shows that there was more business done in the southern district of Iowa than in the two States of Massachusetts and Pennsylvania combined.

The amendment was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 75, noes 104.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I move to amend by striking out of the two-thousand-dollar class "Northern Mississippi and Southern Mississippi;" so as to have them come within the three-thousand-dollar class.

I offer this amendment in order to equalize the compensation of officers of the Government who perform like service. The bill as it stands will operate unequally. For example, it fixes the compensation of district attorneys of Georgia, Maryland, Louisiana, and California at from $3,000 to $5,000, although the earnings in those districts are but a trifle more than the earnings in Mississippi. On the other hand, it gives the district attorneys of Florida, Delaware, and Nevada, for example, the same pay as is allowed the district attorneys in Mississippi, though the business of these districts does not average more than half as much.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the paragraph under consideration by striking out all after the words "salary now authorized by law" and inserting that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Southern New York, $6,000; Northern New York, Massachusetts, Eastern and Western Pennsylvania, District of Columbia, Southern Ohio, Eastern Missouri, Northern and Southern Illinois, and California, $4,500 each; Maryland, Kentucky, Kansas, Northern Ohio, Eastern Louisiana, Northern Georgia, and Western Texas, $3,500 each; New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Delaware, Nevada, Southern Florida, Connecticut, Northern Mississippi, and Southern Mississippi, $2,000 each; and all other United States district attorneys shall be paid each a salary of $3,000 a year.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I now call the previous question on sections 7, 8, and 9 of the proposed substitute.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Before that motion is put I ask unanimous consent to put on record the fact that I would have offered an amendment if I had had the opportunity. [Laughter.]

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Amendments to section 10 are now in order.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I move to amend by inserting, after the second paragraph of section 10, the following:

Provided, That all such preliminary examinations shall be held and conducted by the officer authorized to hold and conduct such examinations who resides nearest the place where the offense is alleged to have been committed.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEIFER. I hope the House will give a little attention to an amendment which I desire to offer to the second paragraph of section 10. It is to insert, after the word "judge," in line 40, the words "on the application of the accused;" so that it will read:

But any accused person who may be committed in default of bail, may upon the order of the judge, on the application of the accused, be removed to and tried at that place in the judicial district where the court will be held next after his commitment.

Mr. HERBERT. That is right.

Mr. HAMMOND. That is right.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think that is right.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. I do not think it is right. It is optional with every person accused to give bail or not. A person who has committed a crime may make up his mind not to give bail, and will remain in confinement for an indefinite period of time. Perhaps there is but one term of court during the entire year within the locality where he was arrested, and unless the accused shall apply for the removal of his cause, under this amendment, there will be a continuance for the whole year. The amendment takes away from the court the control of its own business.

Mr. KEIFER. I think the House understands the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HERBERT. I desire to offer an amendment: after line 31 of section 10, to insert, after the word "committed," the words "having jurisdiction thereof;" also to insert, after the words "United States court," in line 35, the words "having jurisdiction thereof;" so that it will read:

In preliminary examinations, where there is probable cause of guilt, the commissioner shall bind over the accused, if he shall give the bail required, to appear for trial before the court in his district which may be held nearest the place where the offense was committed having jurisdiction thereof; and if he can not give the required bail, the commissioner shall commit him for trial to the nearest jail where such prisoners can be safely and economically kept, and shall in both cases transmit all the papers in the case to the clerk of the United States court having jurisdiction thereof to be held in said district nearest the place where the offense was committed, at which court grand juries are impaneled.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is right.

Mr. KEIFER. That is clearly implied in the section as it now stands and is not necessary.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is clearly implied, I think, but if any one deems it necessary to insert those words they will do no harm.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELLIS. I desire to offer an amendment to correct a very great abuse which has occurred within my experience. It is to add to the second paragraph of section 10 these words:

And no commissioner or justice of the peace, acting as such, shall demand or receive from any accused party any costs or fee in any criminal procedure until the final conviction of the accused by the verdict of a jury, when such fees may be taxed as costs.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is right; I have no objection to that.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman does not mean to confine his amendment to cases of conviction by the verdict of a jury? Suppose that the man pleads guilty.

Mr. ELLIS. Then have it "after conviction."

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman should strike out the words "by the verdict of a jury."

Mr. ELLIS. I will modify my amendment as suggested.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Texas, which has already been agreed to, comes in at the same place as that now indicated in the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS].

Mr. ELLIS. At the suggestion of other gentlemen I modify my amendment so that it shall be inserted after the word "approval," at the end of line 47.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "by verdict of a jury."

Mr. ELLIS. I have already modified my amendment by striking out those words.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now call the previous question upon this section and all amendments thereto.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of Mr. ELLIS was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. There are certain sections which my colleague on the committee [Mr. VAN ALSTYNE] desires to offer as amendments.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. I move to amend by inserting what I send to the desk as a new section, to follow section 12:

SEC. 13. That section 365 of the Revised Statutes shall be so amended as to read as follows:

"SEC. 365. No compensation shall hereafter be allowed to any attorney or counselor at law for services unless employed and retained by the Attorney-General for a purpose authorized by law, and then only on the certificate of the Attorney-General that such services are actually necessary, and that the same can not be performed by the Attorney-General or Solicitor-General or the other officers of the Department of Justice, or by the district attorneys, which certificate shall be filed of record in the Department of Justice and in the court where such services are to be rendered, before such special assistant attorney or counsel is authorized to appear for or represent the United States; and before such special assistant attorney or counsel can receive any compensation for his services he shall file with the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department a copy of such certificate of the Attorney-General, and a statement of the account and the amount actually due such attorney or counsel. No compensation or remuneration shall be allowed any such assistant or attorney for traveling or other personal expenses incurred in or about the performance of his duties as such special assistant attorney or counsel, and no compensation shall be allowed under this section to any person or firm in excess of $10,000 during any one year."

Mr. KEIFER. I think this is subject to a point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is subject to a point of order; but I ask the gentleman to withdraw the point. The provision is for the purpose of regulating the appointment of special counsel.

Mr. KEIFER. If I should withdraw the point, it will be renewed.

Mr. BISBEE. I insist on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. RANDALL. I now call the previous question on the substitute as amended.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. I desire to offer a further amendment——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraw the call for the previous question to allow this amendment to be offered? [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. SPRINGER. There are two other sections which were agreed upon by the committee, but were not included in this substitute as offered because they were subject to a point of order. I think, however, no point of order will be made upon these other two provisions, and it will take only a moment to dispose of them. One of these proposes to make it perjury for any one to swear falsely in a case where an oath is authorized to be administered under a regulation prescribed by the head of any Department. The provision is recommended by the Attorney-General.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has demanded the previons question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not think he desires to cut off these two amendments.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the substitute as amended was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I now call the previous question on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. KEIFER. I understood this morning that the gentleman from Pennsylvania obtained unanimous consent to move to suspend the rules in order to pass this bill, the right being reserved to consider certain specific amendments. It seems to me the only thing he can now do is to make his motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair this morning stated that in the absence of objection it would be considered that the rules had been suspended and the bill was before the House for consideration under the arrangement proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KEIFER. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order. This morning when consent was asked to consider this bill it was stated that seven amendments should be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. I submit that while the gentleman from Pennsylvania can cut off debate he can not cut off the proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN ALSTYNE] to amend.

The SPEAKER. It has always been held that when the House is considering a matter as in Committee of the Whole the previous question may be ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. Only for the purpose of cutting off debate, not to cut off amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must remember that under the agreement made this morning by unanimous consent only certain amendments were to be allowed to be voted on. Now the gentleman from New York proposes one not included in that list. All the amendments upon which the right to vote was reserved have been disposed of.

Mr. HOLMAN. I stand corrected.

Mr. RANDALL. Before the question is put on ordering the previous question I desire to say that I consent to an amendment striking out, on page 7 of the bill, the words "and that the labor of convicts shall be utilized as much as possible in the conduct of the work."

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the amendment indicated by the gentlemen from Pennsylvania will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDALL. I now renew the demand for the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. RANDALL demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I move to recommit the bill with instructions to report it back with an amendment to make the salary of the district attorney of the district of Indiana equal to that of the district attorney of the southern district of Illinois.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Let me include the district attorney of Kentucky.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I ask for a vote on my motion.

The motion to recommit was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 181, nays 35, not voting 107; as follows:

Mr. WILLIS with Mr. REED.

Mr. ENGLISH with Mr. MCCOMAS.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, with Mr. BAYNE.

Mr. LORE with Mr. PETTIBONE.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. THOMAS; but understanding we did not differ on this question, I have voted.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CRESZENTIA FRANK.

Mr. MORRISON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7427) for the relief of Creszentia Frank and minor children; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 6861) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and asked a conference of the two Houses on the disagreeing votes thereon, and had appointed Messrs. LOGAN, PLUMB, and RANSOM managers on the part of the Senate at said conference.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted, as follows:

To Mr. BRAINARD, for ten days, on important business.

To Mr. MORGAN, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. LOWRY, for the remainder of the week, on account of important business.

To Mr. SKINNER, of North Carolina, for three days, on account of pressing business.

And then, on motion of Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas (at 6 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BINGHAM: Petition against merging the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey into the Navy and Interior Departments. Also, a petition establishing a national cemetery near Philadelphia—severally to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. CARLETON: Petition of William Sanborn Post, No. 98, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Michigan, by Frank Whipple, Edwin S. Petit, and Stephen H. Avery, committee, asking Congress to grant one hundred and sixty acres of land, &c., to soldiers of the late war, &c.—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. CONNOLLY: Petition of Thomas O. Robinson, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ERMENTROUT: Memorial of the Engineers' Club of Philadelphia, relative to the United States Coast Survey—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. GOFF: Petition of Jefferson Long, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HALSELL: Paper relating to the bill for the relief of B. H. Coussz—to the Select Committee on Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay.

Also, papers relating to the claim of John Burnam—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HOLMAN: Petition of W. M. Jackman, clerk, and all the other county officers of Jefferson County, Indiana, and many leading citizens, asking for a pension for George Ralston—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KELLEY: Petition of 15 members of the Grand Army of the Republic, praying for the establishment of a national cemetery at Philadelphia—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MORRISON: Memorial of Creszentia Frank, for a pension for herself and minor children—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. O'HARA: Papers relating to the claim of Benjamin F. Parrott—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. STOCKSLAGER: Resolutions of Samuel Simonson Post, No. 226, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Indiana, relating to pensions, &c.—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, papers relating to the pension claim of James Agnew—to the same committee.

Also, papers relating to the claim of Eliza Rucker—to the same committee.

By Mr. VANCE: Papers relating to the claims of sundry citizens of Macon County, North Carolina—to the same committee.

By Mr. J. D. WHITE: Petition for the relief of James Casteel—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 24, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of Mayor S. H. Ferguson and 204 other citizens of Hot Springs, Ark., praying for the passage of an act confirmatory of the awards of the Hot Springs Commission, and to settle titles to property on the reservation; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents a memorial of the Engineers' Club of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against the passage of the bill to merge the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey into the Navy and Interior Departments. The Chair does not remember what reference has been made of similar memorials. The memorial will be laid on the table, if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present the petition of a large number of soldiers of Richland County, Ohio, praying for the passage of certain bills in accordance with reports prepared by their comrades of the Grand Army of the Republic, the substance of which has been embodied in the pending bill now under consideration. I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I present a memorial of the Diamond Match Company, manufacturers of every variety of matches, and also clay and wood pipes, of Akron, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of a bill in regard to the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present a memorial of the Engineers' Club of Philadelphia, remonstrating against the transfer of the Coast and Geodetic Survey from the Treasury to the Navy and Interior Departments. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presented a memorial from the same club a few moments ago upon the same subject, which, on account of the state of public business, was laid upon the table.

Mr. MITCHELL. Very well; if that is the proper disposition to be made of the memorials.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FRYE. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to report favorably the bill (S. 2339) to authorize the appointment of a commission of naval architects and marine engineers to examine and report upon new designs for steamships, and to ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Appropriations with a request that it be made an item in the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Commerce will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, if there be no objection.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1627) granting a pension to Flavia A. Haskell, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1220) for the relief of Michael O'Brien, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2543) granting a pension to James Roden, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4846) granting a pension to Mary E. Seymour, widow of Charles J. Seymour, a deceased soldier, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. I am also directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 137) for the relief of Betsey A. Mower, to submit an adverse report thereon. This lady is the widow of Major-General Mower. The bill proposes to grant her an increase of pension from $30 to $50 per month, she being the widow of an officer of high rank and in indigent circumstances. The majority of the committee report adversely to the bill, while the minority are in favor of its passage. I ask the bill be placed on the Calendar, and that the report be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered, if there be no objection.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1338) for the relief of Betsey A. Mower, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. PLATT. I understand the House bill in that case has been reported favorably.

Mr. BLAIR. The House bill has not been reported favorably. The minority of the committee are in favor of the passage of the bill and it has been placed on the Calendar. I move that the Senate bill be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1628) anthorizing and directing the sale of the real estate and riparian rights now owned by the United States at Harper's Ferry, in the State of West Virginia, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2300) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain the amounts due to Nathan Myrick, Joseph and Charles M. Dailey, William H. Forbes, and Louis Roberts & Co., or their legal representatives, citizens of the United States, for supplies furnished to the Sioux or Dakota Indians of Minnesota subsequent to August, 1860, and prior to the massacre of August, 1862, and providing for the payment thereof, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 786) for the relief of William W. Thomas, reported it with amendments.

Mr. VAN WYCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1631) to increase the pension of Mathew O. Regan, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3623) granting a pension to Sarah E. Price, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2217) granting a pension to Sarah E. Price, reported adversely thereon, and moved that it be postponed indefinitely; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3294) granting a pension to Emma A. Porch, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4141) for the relief of Mrs. Rebecca J. Pierce, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1398) granting an increase of pension to Andrew J. Bolar, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1430) granting a pension to Sarah C. Hall, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2419) granting a pension to Robert Nutt, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3613) granting a pension to Ira McNair, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1998) for the relief of William J. Sawyer, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6767) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Virginia Zeilin, to submit an adverse report thereon. I was requested to ask that the bill be placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. HAMPTON. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2064) for the repair of Fort Marion, at Saint Augustine, Fla., and the inclosure of the grounds attached to said fort, to report it back, and to request that it may be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I beg leave to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to this report. The Committee on Military Affairs recommend the passage of the bill, but think that the proper disposition of it would be to refer it to the Committee on Appropriations, as it involves an appropriation, so that it may be placed as an item in the fortification appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Military Affairs will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, if there be no objection.

Mr. COLQUITT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 439) granting a pension to Bridget Sherlock, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1971) granting a pension to Mrs. Catharine H. Glick, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HARRISON. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back the petition for the relief of John McNaughton, presented by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON], and to ask to be discharged from its further consideration. The committee report against granting the prayer of the petitioner, on the ground that Congress has already passed a general law for the correction of the records in the muster of officers.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I also report back from the Committee on Military Affairs the petition of George Johnson, of Detroit, Mich., "praying compensation for wrongs, injuries, and losses suffered by him in consequence of the illegal and wrongful action of the military authorities during the war of the rebellion." The petitioner claims that he was wrongfully drafted and mustered into the service, and asks compensation for the injury that resulted to his business, and also for the mortification which he suffered in being taken as a drafted man when he had before volunteered and had been rejected by reason of physical disability. The committee are of opinion that we can not compensate him for these injuries. As to the other matter of which he complains, that he is unjustly marked as a deserter, we think that under existing law he is entitled to relief from that charge, upon proof of the fact stated, upon application to the Secretary of War. The committee report therefore adversely to the prayer of the petitioner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks that the prayer of the petitioner be denied. That order will be entered if there be no objection.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 267) granting a pension to James King, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 999) granting a pension to James King, reported adversely thereon; and it was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4234) granting a pension to Mary Ullery, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 314) for the relief of John W. Cummins, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1569) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary M. Ord, widow of Maj. Gen. E. O. C. Ord, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1900) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary M. Ord, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1237) granting a pension to Solomon K. Ruggles, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 645) granting a pension to Solomon K. Ruggles, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. GARLAND. The Committee on the Judiciary have instructed me to report an amendment to the bill (H. R. 1682) providing for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota. I ask that the amendment may lie on the table and be printed, to be called up when the bill is brought before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2321) for the relief of Bessie S. Gilmore, reported it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on the Library, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MAHONE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2246) to provide for the purchase of additional land for the uses of the public building in the city of New Bedford, State of Massachusetts, reported it without amendment.

NATIONAL BANK OF MIDDLETOWN, PA.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report back favorably the bill (H. R. 6021) to authorize the National Bank of Middletown, Pa., to change its location and name. I am also directed, as this is a House bill and will take no longer at any time to pass it than to read the bill, to ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LAPHAM introduced a bill (S. 2340) to amend section 5406 of the Revised Statutes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. LAPHAM. I ask that this bill lie on the table for the present. At the proper time I shall call it up for the purpose of submitting some remarks upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). The bill will lie on the table subject to be called up by the Senator from New York.

Mr. LAPHAM introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 95) for the printing of extra copies of the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in regard to alleged outrages in Danville, Va.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

MRS. MARY ROSS.

Mr. SAWYER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Mrs. Mary Ross, widow of James Ross, deceased, late an employé of the Senate, the sum of $161.50 for funeral expenses, out of the contingent fund.

HOUR OF DAILY MEEEING.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the daily hour of meeting of the Senate for the rest of the present session be 11 o'clock a. m., unless otherwise ordered.

I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the resolution at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. PENDLETON. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the resolution goes over.

Mr. SHERMAN subsequently said: My colleague [Mr. PENDLETON] objected to a resolution offered by me a few moments ago in regard to the time of the morning meeting of the Senate. He desires to withdraw that objection, and I hope the Senate will consent to the passage of the resolution.

I ask unanimous consent to consider it now.

Mr. PENDLETON. I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] asks unanimous consent that the resolution offered by him be now considered. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the daily hour of meeting of the Senate for the rest of the present session be 11 o'clock a. m., unless otherwise ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

DISTRICT TAXES AND EXPENDITURES.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to call up from the Calendar two resolutions that I offered some time since, Nos. 675 and 676 in the Order of Business on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 675, being a resolution directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to report to the Senate the aggregate amount collected from taxation for each of the fiscal years from 1875 to 1884, inclusive. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to call up in connection with it the next resolution, which relates to a similar subject. They are really designed to be one resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can hardly entertain a motion to have two resolutions before the Senate at the same moment of time.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I shall offer it as an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate and the Senator from Alabama proposes an amendment to it.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the resolution be read at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read, and then the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. MORGAN June 2, as follows:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be directed to report to the Senate the aggregate amount collected from taxation for each of the fiscal years from 1875 to 1884, inclusive, in each of the four quarters of the city of Washington, in Georgetown, and in the county of Washington outside of said cities. Also, the aggregate amount expended in each of said six divisions for each of said ten years for street improvements of all kinds, including the replacement of wood, stone, and macadam pavements, new pavements, laying sidewalks, regulating, grading and filling up streets, repairs to concrete pavements and macadam roadways, parking, for permit work, and for repairs to streets, avenues, alleys, county roads, suburban streets, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama offers an amendment which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the resolution the following:

Also a statement of the taxes that have been assessed against each of the railroad companies in the District of Columbia, whether operated by steam or other power, for each year since 1874, and the amount of taxes collected from each of said companies for each of said years, and the amount remaining uncollected, if any, for each of said years.

Mr. MORGAN. After the word "assessed" I move to insert "or special assessments made."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the amendment?

Mr. MORGAN. In the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment can be so modified by the mover.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be reported as modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the resolution:

Also a statement of the taxes that have been assessed or special assessments made against each of the railroad companies in the District of Columbia, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. There is no objection, so far as I am advised, to the information that is called for in the resolution. A large proportion of what is called for is already found in the printed annual reports of the commissioners of the District. I should like to make a single suggestion to the Senator, and that is that the present form of government was established in 1878. Prior to that time a different system of administration prevailed. I suggest to the Senator whether it would not be wise and accomplish all the results he desires to attain, and spare a great amount of labor which is perhaps unnecessary and certain to be very difficult, to fix the date at 1878.

The commissioners, in speaking with me upon this subject, advised me that prior to 1878 it would be exceedingly difficult and practically impossible, without the employment of a very large clerical force and the investigation of scattered and segregated volumes of records, item by item, to furnish this information; it would require computation and calculation.

If the Senator would be willing, I should like, in the interest of economy and what I also think would be a rough kind of justice, to hold the commissioners responsible for what has occurred since the present District government was established; and I would suggest to him that the year 1878 be substituted for the year 1875.

Mr. MORGAN. I believe I have no objection to that. The request is a reasonable one, perhaps.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama will be modified accordingly, striking out "1875" where it occurs and inserting "1878" in lieu thereof. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to add to the resolution the following:

Resolved further, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be required to report to the Senate a statement of the receipts and disbursements on account of the water department, or water fund, for each year from 1878 to 1884, inclusive, stating the amount received from each separate source, and when, where, and for what purpose the money has been expended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1340) to establish and maintain a bureau of labor statistics.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6861) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WILLIAM H. FORNEY of Alabama, Mr. RICHARD W. TOWNSHEND of Illinois, and Mr. J. WARREN KEIFER of Ohio managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5377) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department; asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GEORGE W. GEDDES of Ohio, Mr. JOHN B. STORM of Pennsylvania, and Mr. JONATHAN H. ROWELL of Illinois managers at the conference on the part of the House.

MEXICAN WAR PENSIONS.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 5667, known as the Mexican pension bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Was there an agreement to take up the Mexican pension bill after the morning business, or at 2 o'clock?

Mr. HARRIS and Mr. INGALLS. After the morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands from the RECORD that the agreement was to take the bill up immediately on the conclusion of the call for resolutions.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I do not wish to interfere with it. I was about to suggest that we dispose of the pension cases on the Calendar and to take up the Mexican pension bill at 2 o'clock; but if there was an agreement entered into, I do not wish to interpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5667) granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRISON. I see that an amendment is necessary in order to conform the first section to a change made in the early part of the section. I move to strike out these words in line 18 of that section:

Although their term of service may have been less than sixty days.

So that it will leave the clause to read:

And to such other officers and soldiers and sailors as may have been personally named in any resolution of Congress for any specific service in said wars, and the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted men.

Mr. HARRIS. What print has the Senator from Indiana? The print of this morning?

Mr. HARRISON. The print of this morning.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not find that language in line 18.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana proposes an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1 of the reprinted bill, line 18, after the word "wars," it is proposed to strike out:

Although their term of service may have been less than sixty days.

Mr. HARRISON. It will be seen by Senators who have the bill before them that this includes all those who were specially noticed by resolution of Congress. It is simply a formal amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HARRISON. I think we should also strike off the letter "s" in "wars," so that it shall be "in said war."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana to strike out the words which have been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves to amend in line 18 by striking out the letter "s" at the end of the word "wars." If there be no objection that amendment will be considered as agreed to. It is agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, on the 4th of March last House bill 5667, "granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes," was read twice and referred to the Committee on Pensions. It remained in the control of the committee until May 8, when it was reported with amendments, something over two months after its reference. As it came from the House of Representatives it was simply a bill to pension the soldiers of the Mexican war, and for no other purpose whatever. After that long delay and consideration it came from the Committee on Pensions back to the Senate simply and purely a bill to pension the soldiers of the Mexican war. No soldiers of any other war were named. The committee reported some amendments, but those amendments had special reference to the bill as it came from the House.

The House bill showed on its face that it was a recognition by the representatives of the people of the great services which had been rendered to the country by those who had served in the Mexican war. It was a limited bill in amount. It gave $8 a month, and that $8 went to the highest officer in the Mexican war and the drummer boy alike. There was no distinction in that bill on account of rank. All were treated upon the same exact level.

It was reported back from the Pensions Committee of the Senate, and so it went on until yesterday, when an amendment was placed upon the bill on the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] which materially changed the original purpose of the bill as it came to us.

That amendment applied the doctrine of pecuniary need or want to all those under 62 years of age, but removed it from those who had passed that age. Then an amendment was offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL], embracing sections 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13 of the bill as it has been reprinted and as it comes before us this morning. That amendment entirely revolutionizes the structure and purpose of the bill as it came to us from the House and as it came to us from the Senate Committee on Pensions. It takes in an unknown number of beneficiaries who served in the late war. It places them upon the pension-roll upon a different and higher rate of pension to that fixed for the soldiers of the Mexican war; it increases the pension of all those who are now pensioned at the rate of $8 a month up to $12 per month, and for total disability it authorizes a pension of $24 per month and correspondingly for disability less than total. Not a paper from the Commissioner of Pensions or from any source, no statement from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanies that amendment—nothing to show to what extent that bill, if enacted, will take money from the Treasury. Nothing whatever came with that amendment to enlighten the Senate on the subject; no discussion, nothing illustrative of the amendment.

This amendment having been read, which is substantially a new and independent bill, not germane to the bill we were considering, totally dissimilar in every regard save that they both relate to wars, but different wars, unaccompanied by any paper whatever to throw light upon it, the Senator from Pennsylvania said:

Mr. MITCHELL. I have no desire whatever to detain the Senate with a single remark. These amendments are important, but I think they are clearly understood, and I am quite willling myself that we have a vote without debate.

And then came a cry of "Vote!" "Vote!" None of the friends of the Mexican pension bill made such a call, because they wanted light on the subject of these amendments. No man, not even the chairman of the Committee on Pensions [Mr. MITCHELL], gave us any light on the subject; we had none from any source whatever. The cry of "Vote!" "Vote!" came, and the vote was taken; and then the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], who is not regarded in this Senate or elsewhere as a man dull of comprehension, made this modest request:

So far as I am concerned I shall not be prepared to vote upon the bill until I see it printed as amended, and I therefore desire that the bill shall be printed with the amendments agreed to in committee.

And then came an effort to get the vote, in spite of that statement made by the Senator from Tennessee, and afterward an attempt to fix the vote for to-day at 1 o'clock and without debate. I objected. It seems that my objection could not be heard by the presiding officer, but I made myself heard. I objected because I thought that, this bill having been revolutionized and matters placed on it which were not in the original bill (and as we had had no possible opportunity to understand the purpose and extent of the amendment), we had a right to look into it. Afterward it was agreed that we might have ten minutes each to explain our position to-day.

Mr. President, it has been stated that the Mexican war was unjust, and from the beginning of the discussion it seems to me that there has been attempted to be cast on those who served in the Mexican war a glamour of suspicion as if they were marauders and the country had engaged in a foul, unjust, and unholy war with Mexico, and that the Mexican war was wantonly brought on by the United States Government for the purpose of pillaging a defenseless people.

Mr. President, it is well to read history aright. The first overt act of war was the act of the Mexican Government, through its army on American soil, in the capture of Thornton and his squadron on Texas soil, then part of the United States. That capture of Thornton and his command in April, 1846, caused that sturdy old soldier Zachary Taylor, who then headed the army of occupation between the Nueces and the Rio Grande, to send a dispatch to his Government that "war existed by the act of Mexico." That is history; and then the President of the United States (Mr. Polk) in his message to Congress communicating these facts stated that "war existed by the act of Mexico;" and when that army of Taylor moved over near to the Rio Grande opposite to Matamoras, but still on our own soil, he found the Mexican General Arista, one of the most accomplished soldiers of the Mexican army, in command of the flower of that army upon American soil, and the battles of the 8th and 9th of May, 1846, and the defense of Fort Brown were upon American soil. There had been no invasion of Mexico by the United States, and it is a perversion of history to say so.

But, sir, after the battles of the 8th and 9th of May and the siege of Fort Brown, upon soil within the territorial jurisdiction of the Union, the army of occupation became, and properly, an army of invasion, as it was right to become, and in September, 1846, the battle of Monterey was fought, and there Taylor met Ampudia in that fortified city, with its Bishop's Palace fortified, and the Black Fort and Fort Teneria, and the city itself honeycombed with port holes, and it and its great fortifications defended by an army almost double in number that of Taylor.

It was a desperate battle, but victory again perched on the Stars and Stripes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. According to the understanding of yesterday the Senator's ten minutes have expired.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator from Texas will be allowed to proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not a matter of rule. It is a matter of understanding. The Senator from Texas is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MAXEY. I thank the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] for the courtesy of his request. I was endeavoring to speak in the briefest possible manner, and I will continue to do so. After that battle of Monterey came on the battle of Buena Vista, February, 1847, where Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna had collected with a rapidity rarely equaled by a general of this or any other age an army of 20,000 men, and confronted General Taylor, who had only 5,000 men, at what we call Buena Vista, and what they call La Angostura. The result we all know. That little band of 5,000 men, handled with skill and valor by capable officers, and fought by men of courage, struck down the Mexican army of 20,000; and then the war was practically changed from the line of Taylor across to that which General Scott was establishing, his purpose being to proceed to and take Vera Cruz and fight into the very heart of Mexico, capturing its capital. Landing at Vera Cruz early in March, 1847, his line of circumvallation was rapidly formed. On the next morning—he landed his troops at night—he began forming the line, the right resting at Sacrificios, the left at Vergara, and thus Vera Cruz was embraced between our Army by land and our Navy by sea, and there was no succor that could reach the Mexicans at Vera Cruz. Scott could have taken Vera Cruz at any time by assault after his line was formed, but at heavy loss, for Vera Cruz was a walled city, fortified strongly at every point. A merciful man always to his soldiers, Scott preferred to pursue the slower course, and he took that city with a trifling loss unparalleled in history. It was a battle of science and of siege guns.

Passing rapidly from Vera Cruz up the National Road toward the City of Mexico, he stormed, on the 17th and 18th of April, 1847, what were regarded by the Mexicans as the impregnable heights of Cerro Gordo, commanded in person by Santa Anna, who had rapidly recovered from his defeat at Buena Vista, organized a new army, largely superior to ours in numbers, and confronted Scott at Cerro Gordo. There the Mexicans went down, and the flag of the Union floated proudly from the citadel heights of Cerro Gordo, which had been commanded by Santa Anna in person.

Rapidly moving on from Cerro Gordo toward the capital, halting part of his command at Jalapa, he pushed a column forward and took the strong fortress of the castle of Peroté, and moving on to Puebla, halted his army there to rest and recruit and wait for re-enforcements and gather information for the advance to the City of Mexico. In the early days of August, 1847, he moved his army on toward the City of Mexico. No man who was in that column will ever forget that narrow inverted crescent which connected the snow-capped mountains of Popocatepetl and Iztaccihuatl, and the magnificent sight which burst upon his vision when he reached the summit of that ridge. There below lay the valley of Mexico, with its lakes and vines and orange and lemon groves, and its villages and churches, and in the distance the beautiful capital of Mexico, with its 200,000 people, its windows shining like burnished gold in the glitter of the bright, cloudless sun of the beautiful morning. The army entered the valley of Mexico, and as they passed out of view every road behind them was destroyed by the enemy. Moving on as if to enter the City of Mexico by the Peñon Causeway, Scott rapidly made a détour of Lake Chalco and camped at the villages of San Augustin and Oxomilcho, and on the 19th of August, 1847, threw a portion of his column in front of Contreras and opened fire.

Between our army and the rear of Contreras there were great bodies of molten lava thrown out by volcanic eruptions of Popocatepetl and Iztaccihuatl, obstacles which appeared to render crossing impossible, and yet Scott's army did cross that pedregal and reached the rear of the fortifications at Contreras.

The engineers made their way under shot and shell, supported by our troops, and sketched the fortification of Contreras with all its guns and the routes of approach, and on the morning of the 20th of August that magnificent assault was made upon Contreras which in a few moments after it began resulted in the capture of that fortification, all their guns and all their munitions of war; and among all that prize of war on that day, with great field-guns, two little guns of field artillery attracted more attention than all else beside. They were the guns which O'Brien had abandoned at Buena Vista when he had fought them down to the muzzle and had no more men to handle them. Then these pieces were captured by overwhelming force. They were recaptured at Contreras, and a shout went up to the blue arch of heaven from the gallant men who recaptured them. Then on the evening of the same day of the 20th of August was fought the battle of Churubusco, or rather three distinct battles at the same time, all however bearing on each other, and after a few days' rest Molino del Rey was won on the 8th September, 1847, and then the assault upon the heights of Chapultepec, and then that terrible march along the aqueducts leading to the garita de Belen and the garita de San Cosmé, and the entrance of the city was reached on the evening of the 13th of September. A city of 200,000 inhabitants captured by an army of gallant Americans less than 10,000 in number, a city defended at every point and with an army led by that famed commander Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna within its walls of 30,000 men! Wonderful! History does not present a parallel.

The siege-guns of our forces were placed to enfilade the streets, and all during that night until 3 o'clock in the morning the shells and shot could be heard from those heavy guns as they sped their way hurtling down the streets toward the grand plaza crushing walls, sweeping and destroying everything in their frightful course. At 3 o'clock in the morning the city authorities formally called upon General Scott and notified him that the city had been evacuated by the army, and delivered to him the keys of the city, on that morning of the 14th of September, and when the sun shone clear in that cloudless sky the Stars and Stripes in a foreign land were raised by our soldiers over the Palace of Mexico, and as the glad folds flew out to the breeze, the shouts went up to heaven's blue dome from those who had victoriously carried that flag; and thus virtually ended the war.

I pass by the subordinate movements of that war, and I call your attention hurriedly as I have done, for want of time, to the grand achievements I have mentioned. After the capture of Thornton, on the 16th of April, 1846, there was never a retreat nor a defeat of the American forces. There was a fighting army which entered the City of Mexico with less than 10,000 and captured that city of 200,000 people fortified at every point and defended by an army of 30,000, and that army of 10,000 brave Americans dictated the terms of peace from the capital of Mexico.

Such is history and the truth of history. Mr. President, when this glorious news came back to the States, peans of praise were sung to those men who had accomplished such grand results. I challenge any man to point out its equal in all the annals of history. Take the campaigns of Pyrrhus, of Alexander, of Julius Cæsar, of Napoleon Bonaparte, and there is not in all the annals of history an account of any war conducted with such strategic skill, with such practical intelligence, such tactical knowledge, or with such uniform good conduct and without a retreat or a defeat, fighting always from three to five times their numbers, paying for all supplies, robbing no one. These gallant soldiers returned to their country, and when they came back received ovations everywhere. They were young and full of life; they thought they had done their country a service. So they were received, and they brought back and gave to their country a flag unstained by one act of dishonor, borne by an army of heroes, bearing the title deeds to an empire, which they freely gave their beloved country.

Mr. President, the representatives of the people have recognized the obligations of the Republic to her soldiers in Mexico on many occasions, and have sent bills here more than once, passed by the people's representatives, but they have not passed this body. At last a bill was brought here in compliance with the expressed will of twenty-eight States, and with some amendments met the approval of the Committee on Pensions and was reported back favorably. No one else but these soldiers and their widows was mentioned. Here in the Senate at this late hour of the session that bill is materially and essentially amended, and upon the motion of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, without a word of explanation, a demand is made for an immediate vote, and we who were not willing to vote without explanation and at once will be charged with opposing pensioning soldiers of the Mexican war!

Sir, if the soldier of the Mexican war is entitled to a pension it is because of the service he rendered the country, and he is entitled to be placed upon the same dead level equally and exactly with the soldier of any other war. He obeyed his Government when he took up arms in its defense. His life is as dear to him in a war which you may not think just, as the life of a man in another war you think just. The Government, not the soldier, proclaims war. It is his to obey. And yet here on the face of this bill as now amended, we have an invidious distinction, broad, clearly marked, that the soldier of the Mexican war must content himself if pensioned to $8 a month, while the soldier of another war gets $12 under like circumstances. The soldiers of the Mexican war may have contracted disease, as many have done, which has doubled their once manly forms. They have been dragging along wearily through life. Under no state of case do they receive more than $8 a month, but under like circumstances the soldiers of the later war get $24 per month. If one is entitled, the other is entitled. Why this distinction? Why pension the Mexican soldiers at all, if you are unwilling to place them on the same footing as others rendering no greater obedience to their country's call than they have?

Sir, it may be said that there are but few of these old men left. All of them put together placed in one single Congressional district of my State would not change the result of an election if they were all to vote alike. There are but few of them. The time was in history when they were heroes. The time has come when it appears to be a mark of disgrace in the eyes of some people to have served in that war. They think the war was unjust. There is a Providence which overrules nations as well as men; and when you come to look at the grand results of that war, you find that there has been devoted to Christian civilization, and to political liberty, a grand empire which before it came into our possession, was the home of the wild beast and the still wilder savage.

That war was not begun by the United States, and this Government had a right to enter into articles for the annexation of Texas, recognized by all the leading powers of earth as independent, and so recognized by this Government years before annexation. We had the same right to defend Texas after annexation that we had to defend New Orleans after the Louisiana purchase when Jackson hurled defiance at Packenham and his cohorts with their battle-cry of "Beauty and booty!" Neither belonged to the country when the Union was formed; both were obtained afterward; and by that grand acquisition of Louisiana, which was denounced by many as unholy and unjustifiable, Christianity and civilization broadened their borders, and the whole world is better for it; and so it is as to that great country brought in by the Mexican war.

Sir, the question is, are these men entitled to a pension? If entitled to it they are entitled to as much as anybody else, and should receive exactly under like circumstances the same pension that others receive. If they are not entitled, strike them down and give them nothing. One or the other course should be pursued. Sir, being one of the survivors of the Mexican war myself, my sympathies and affections are naturally with the men with whom I stood for near two long years upon a foreign soil, upholding as best I knew how the flag of my country. My sympathies are with them, and I have been an advocate in season and out of season of a bill pensioning these soldiers.

We knew measurably well what that would cost. But here comes in an amendment to the bill, an amendment as it is called, but a substantial, independent, and distinct measure, wholly dissimilar in all regards from the bill that came to us, except that both propose to grant pensions—that is all—but in a different way; for the pension given to the last is different and higher than that given to the first. There is no justice, there is no reason, there is no fair dealing in that.

And, sir, the bill as amended we must now act upon. I regret to be compelled to say that I have believed for the last ten days that what has come to pass would come to pass. I have believed for more than ten days that this bill, so far as its original purpose was concerned, had its fate sealed, and sealed in a caucus the deliberations of which are unknown to this side of the Chamber; that it was the design and purpose that this bill should not go through unless it was so handicapped as to force Democrats in the position of appearing to be against a bill which they were really in favor of, because being now amended we can not take part and reject the rest. We must take it now all or none. That, in my mind, was the object and purpose, and so I have said nothing for more than ten days about this bill one way or the other, until yesterday evening I stated my objection to this plan of forcing a vote without the poor privilege of explanation.

Mr. President, if the amendment which the Senator from Pennsylvania offered and which has been adopted is just and fair and right in itself, why did not the Committee on Pensions report it, and why did that not come before the body as an independent measure? Who has ever heard in the entire history of this country of a measure brought in upon a sudden without debate, without an explanation, which would cost the Government of the United States untold millions of dollars, and a vote attempted to be forced upon it at once? Sir, there is something more than this sudden desire to help these people of the late war. There is something beyond that.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Texas allow me to correct the statement that the Committee on Pensions had not reported this amendment? A bill substantially the same as the amendment moved by the Senator from Pennsylvania was reported from that committee and is on the Calendar.

Mr. MAXEY. Yes; I have heard that by a strictly party vote in committee a bill which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] had offered, and which was sent to the Committee on Pensions, was reported back by that committee. That bill was offered as an amendment to this bill by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK]. That went down. If that went down, why should not this go down? If it is the same thing, let us take a vote on it, and as the Senate has put its seal of condemnation upon that, or rather as it was withdrawn after much debate, why should it put its imprimatur on this? There is no reason for it. Let us know the facts. We do not know them. We have been told that there is something that will throw some light on this somewhere, accompanying some amendment not adopted, or now before the Senate. That is not the way to present it. The light ought to be shed upon this amendment which has been voted on this bill and let the Senate and country know what the cost will be, let the Senate know whether or not those intrusted with pensions favor it; let the Senate know what the Secretary of the Treasury thinks will be the burden upon the Treasury. Let us know the facts; let those who favor this measure, put on by way of amendment, explain it. None of this is vouchsafed to us, and we are called upon to act without information. Without a word of comment, without a ray of light on the measure, we hear the call from enemies of the Mexican pension bill as it came to us, "Vote!" "Vote!" "Vote!"

But the Senator from Pennsylvania says he is not opposed to it. Sir, the Senator may think that he is speaking with absolute sincerity, and I would not deny his words, but how often men are deceived. I prefer the action to the word, and the action does not speak friendship to the bill. That gentlemen may vote for the bill as it is I doubt not, but not because it gives a pittance to soldiers of the Mexican war.

I have said more than I intended, Mr. President. I thank the Senate very kindly for their courtesy extended to me in prolonging my time. I have now placed on record the reasons why I can not support the bill handicapped by incongruous amendments having no just relation to the bill sent to us by the representatives of the people.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

BUREAU OF LABOR STATISTICS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives communicating its action on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the labor statistics bill, so called, the title of which will be read and the action of the House of Representatives on the report of the conference committee.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 1340) to establish and maintain a bureau of labor statistics.

IN HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June 24, 1884.

Resolved, That the House concur in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1340) to establish and maintain a bureau of labor statistics.

Mr. ALDRICH. I submit the report of the conference committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island reports from the conferees on the part of the Senate on the bill now laid before the Senate. The report will be read.

Mr. MITCHELL. I submit to the Senator whether that is proper at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will first be read. It is the duty of the Chair to lay it before the Senate under the rule. Then the Chair will state the question. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1340) to establish and maintain a bureau of labor statistics, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 12 of said amendments, after the word "Interior," insert the words "upon the recommendation of said commissioner;" and the Senate agree to the same.

NELSON W. ALDRICH,
H. W. BLAIR,
T. F. BAYARD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

M. A. FORAN,
JOHN J. O'NEILL,
DARWIN R. JAMES,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rules of the Senate provide that reports of this character may be placed before the Senate at any time, and that they shall be then considered unless objection be made, and if objection be made the question shall be taken without debate whether the report shall be then considered. Is there objection to the present consideration of this report?

Mr. MITCHELL. I have no objection at all except that the agreement was made yesterday that we should continue the consideration of the pension bill until 3 o'clock, and that debate should then cease. If unanimous consent is given that this agreement is not obviated by the consideration of this matter I have no objection.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will withdraw the report if there is any objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5377) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GEORGE W. GEDDES of Ohio, Mr. JOHN B. STORM of Pennsylvania, and Mr. JONATHAN H. ROWELL of Illinois managers at the conference on the part of the House.

MEXICAN WAR PENSIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5667) granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of making a speech, for further discussion of this question would be absolutely fruitless; but I desire to give the reasons which will justify me in the vote that I shall cast when the bill comes to its final action.

No man can accuse me of a want of loyalty and fidelity to the Mexican war soldiers. They were the companions of my boyhood, and I cherish in the kindest recollection my service with them. They are my first love, and they all are to me like brothers. When I say that I can not support this outrageous bill which is an insult to those old veterans, I am required to give the reasons which govern me in that vote.

It has been perfectly apparent that the Republican majority of this Senate had the power, whenever they chose to exercise it, to kill this bill either by a direct vote on its merits or by weighing it down with such amendments as they knew would be rejected by the House. It is perfectly clear that if the vote had been taken before the Chicago convention was held, and before the caucus of the Republican party in the Senate some days ago, the bill as it came from the House would now be the law of the land. If this measure is defeated, as I see it is certain to be, for in my judgment it is as dead as a door-nail as a bill to pension the Mexican war soldiers, it is because of the action of the Republican Senators. In this bill as it stands now amended the Mexican war soldiers have not one per cent. interest, and there are provisions in the amendments which are a positive insult to these old veterans.

Everybody said a few weeks ago that this bill was bound to pass, and many test-votes were taken which showed that it would pass, but the Chicago convention was held and a resolution was passed there to open the doors for arrearages of pensions, and forthwith a caucus was held and the result was an amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] providing for arrears, but the Senate yesterday voted it down, voted down the resolution of the Chicago convention, ay, sir, yesterday the Senate did that; but immediately afterward they voted on the resolution of the caucus of the Republican party of the Senate. They voted down the resolution of the Chicago convention, they voted down the people as they expressed themselves in the convention, but they struck the chord of the caucus, and some men whom I thought were the bravest, the boldest, and the most honest I knew have been dragooned by the party lash into a denial of their opinions upon the floor of the Senate. Even my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], now the candidate of that party for the Vice-Presidency, who I thought if there was a brave and honest man on the face of this earth who was afraid neither of man nor devil it was he, has shrunk back and been driven from his sense of public duty to obey the behests of a party caucus.

You were not able to defeat these old Mexican veterans by a vote on the floor of the Senate, but you called a caucus to do it. Shades of Sumner, Morton, Thad. Stevens, and all the great leaders of the Republican party in the palmy days of its power and glory! with scorn and contempt look down upon your successors now in the lead of the great party which you organized, engaged in this miserable little business of making war upon a handful of old soldiers. Call a caucus of Republicans to defeat the just claims of these old war-worn, weather-beaten, and poverty-stricken soldiers who in the prime of their young manhood offered their lives in defense of their country's honor and carried its flag in triumph over a hundred battlefields! You have a caucus to rob them of their pensions. You would not have done this, these amendments would not have been proposed or pressed, if you had thought there would be any danger of their passing the other House. You hope by some parliamentary tactics, by parliamentary maneuvering, to throw upon the Democratic party the responsibility of the defeat of this measure. You know you could do it. You want to do it now, and you want to place the Democrats in the position of opposing both the Union and the Mexican war soldiers.

Well, you may make the most of that, but I for one tell you that I intend to vote against the measure! It contains on its very face provisions that are insulting to the Mexican war soldier. One amendment to this bill proposes to pension all the widows and orphans of the Union soldiers, but none for the widows of Mexican soldiers. It proposes to raise the pension of the widow of the Union soldier from eight to twelve dollars a month, but "turkey" is not said once to the widow of a Mexican soldier. Oh! say the gentlemen, the widow of the Mexican soldier does come in for a pension. Ay, she does if she was married to him forty years ago, before he was discharged from the service. Everybody knows that ninety-nine out of one hundred of the young men who went into the Mexican war were bachelors, and there will not be fifty Mexican soldiers' widows who will ever come in under the provisions of this bill. The boy got married after he came home thirty-five or forty years ago; and although the widow of the Mexican soldier may have been such for thirty-five years, yet under this bill she can not be placed upon the pension-roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir; I will allow you.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to ask the Senator whether when it was proposed to extend that provision to the Mexican pension bill on my motion, the Senator and all that side of the Senate did not vote against it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator knows perfectly well why all amendments were opposed here; his leader, General LOGAN, the Senator from Illinois, rose in his seat and denounced any attempt to put on an amendment at all, and said we must take the bill as it came from the House and not make any amendment to it. Why did you not put it back on the bill when you had the whole matter in your charge? You have been voluminous in your amendments.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator asks me I will respond at this time if he will allow me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I made the proposition in good faith. The Senator voted against it and it was voted down. If the Senator reflects he knows perfectly well that the same proposition is not in order again; but if the Senator will make it I will support it. I think the laws should be liberalized in that respect. I believe it is unjust to that class of women who were married, especially those married soon after the close of the war, to men who were engaged in the Mexican war, and the Senator knows that the burden of all his talk here is misrepresentation not only of my action but of the action of a large number of Senators on this side of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator mean to be personal in that remark?

Mr. MITCHELL. I intend precisely what I say always when I say a thing deliberately like that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not hear it distinctly. I should like the Senator to repeat what he did say,

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator heard it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, I did not hear it all.

Mr. MITCHELL. I stated that the Senator in his remarks had misrepresented the position of Senators, myself included, on this side of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not take offense at that. I surely did not intend to misrepresent.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is no occasion for any offense. I am in perfect good nature, though I am very greatly in earnest when the Senator attacks the action of Senators on this side in regard to this subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I meant no personal attack.

Mr. MITCHELL. My record stands certainly as brightly in favor of the Mexican soldiers as that of the Senator, for I have proposed to liberalize the act in that respect, and I stand ready to do it to-day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But he piles upon that amendments so deep and so heavy as will bury them beyond the power of resurrection.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think the Senator has not studied these amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAWLEY in the chair). The Senator ought not to interrupt the Senator entitled to the floor. The Chair must call attention to the rule. A Senator seeking to interrupt one speaking must rise and ask permission of the Senator who has the floor to interrupt him. The Chair is obliged, according to the understanding arrived at yesterday, to remind the Senator from Kentucky that his ten minutes have expired. The Chair has allowed him to run over a minute or two to make allowance for the interruptions.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope there will be no objection to the Senator proceeding. We all know how he is interested in the subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I rose, Mr. President, merely to say that I did not intend to vote for this bill, and I was going on to show some of the provisions of it which I thought were very unjust to the Mexican soldiers.

Now it is perfectly apparent that no Mexican war soldier under this bill will draw a pension unless he is 62 years of age. That is clear.

Mr. MITCHELL. I know the Senator desires to understand the proposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Here is the provision, and I will show what my construction of it is.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should be glad to come to an understanding in regard to this matter.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let me state my position first.

Mr. MITCHELL. Very well; but the Senator says——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not till I get through with making my statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania will take notice of the Senator's position.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Here is the proposition:

Provided, That every such officer, enlisted man, or widow who is or may become 62 years of age, or who is or may become subject to any disability or dependency equivalent to some cause prescribed or recognized by the pension laws of the United States as a sufficient reason for the allowance of a pension, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act.

There is no existing pension law that recognizes this to the Mexican war soldier, and this does not propose to do it. Therefore no Mexican soldier will be put on under this bill unless he is 62 years of age. That is my construction of it. I may be wrong, but it strikes me in that way. It does not propose to raise the pension of the Mexican soldier drawing $8 to $12. Oh, no! It does not propose to allow the widow of the Mexican soldier, if he should die leaving a widow to-morrow that he took to his bosom thirty years ago, a pension. Oh, no; all the widows and orphans of the Union soldiers will get pensions from the Government, but none of the widows and orphans of the Mexican war soldiers will get pensions unless the widow was married to her husband before his discharge from the Mexican war some thirty-eight or forty years ago. What justice is there in that? What an outrage that is upon the Mexican war soldier!

Then there is another provision in the bill as amended. There are now about 6,000 Mexican war soldiers, wounded and maimed and disabled for service by that war, who have been stricken from the pension-roll for disloyalty in consequence of living in the seceding States during the war, and they have never been restored to the roll, although they have been pardoned by the Government, although by the general amnesty proclaimed and promulgated by the President not only the punishment for the offense but the crime itself long ago had been wiped out, yet there is no provision here to restore these men to the pension-roll.

What justice is there in that? I would scorn as a Mexican war soldier to accept this bill. You can not find a Union soldier—I have talked since Saturday with more than one hundred of them—and every one, from major-generals down to private soldier, denounces these amendments as being certain to destroy the Mexican pension bill and result in no good to them. They all say, "Put the old soldiers through in their own bill, and let us stand upon our own merits in a separate measure coming before the Congress of the country." I have talked to several hundred of them during the past week.

Mr. BLAIR. Allow me to ask a question of the Senator from Kentucky. I ask if it would obviate his objections to this bill if in the first section applying to the Mexican war soldiers——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let me get through first.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to ask a question. I call the Senator's attention to a matter which it may be important for him to consider, whether it would obviate to any extent his objection to this bill, so that it might perhaps meet with his support, if it should be provided in reference to the rate of pension to ex-soldiers that we should pay to such soldiers and widows of soldiers a pension the same in amount as is provided in the third and fourth sections of this act for persons who may receive pensions under those sections. That will place the soldiers of the Mexican war and the widows of those soldiers on precisely the same footing as the soldiers of the war of the Union and their widows.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Everybody can see that that is what it ought to be in the bill, but you on your side of the Chamber have had the management of this thing from the beginning. We never knew what you were doing. I had a sort of idea that all the hostility to the bill in the body was on the part of the committee itself. If we judge by actions and not from words, we must conclude that the Mexican war soldiers have not a friend on the Republican side of the Senate, and they must wait until the Democrats get possession of the Government and all its Departments before there is any hope of benefiting them.

I was saying that the Union soldiers whom I have met, of every grade from major-general down to private soldier, object to this, and the Mexican war soldiers will curse you to the day of their death, and they ought to do it. Mr. President, it is wrong, it is an outrage to them to longer withhold a just and honorable recognition of the services of these old, weather-beaten, war-worn veterans who have carried your flag in triumph, who have plucked from fame the brightest jewels that glitter to-day in the crown of the nation's glory. Do this and you do an act of great injustice. It would be a disgrace to the American Senate, a disgrace to the American nation which will be resented by the American people.

There are so many incongruities, so many inconsistencies, so many injustices in this bill as amended, so many invidious distinctions against Mexican war soldiers that I feel that I should be doing myself injustice as their friend if I were to vote for it, for every man knows that I am their friend. I have pressed this act of justice to them before the Senate for five years, in season and out of season, and I have done it with earnestness, because I felt interested in these old men, but I can not vote for a measure which I believe, if not so intended, will result in the defeat of their bill altogether. I say that if these measures are persevered in the country will repeal the whole pension laws.

This bill will put upon the pension-rolls not less than 500,000 additional pensioners. What does it say? It puts on the pension-roll all who are or shall become disabled from any cause not the result of their own vicious conduct and who rely in whole or in part on their labor or the assistance of others for support. Will not that include everybody? Is there a perfectly sound man upon the face of this earth 35 years of age? We all know how easy it is to get a certificate of disability. What does the word "disability" mean here? A country doctor who is paid for his services, and who may get the back-pay that the soldier owes him, will certify to disability; and the man's friends and neighbors have heard the old man complain of a bunion on his toe, a felon on his finger, of twitches of neuralgia, of spasms of rheumatism or sciatica, of ten thousand ills that flesh is heir to, all of which constitute a disability to some extent.

You know that 500,000 men will come in under that amendment. As to a man's being compelled to support himself by his labor, everybody does that. All will come in under that, or nearly all, and hence I say that this bill will be rejected by Congress; it will be rejected by the country; it is opposed to-day by the Union soldiers, and it is resented by the Mexican war soldiers. I shall, therefore, if these amendments be kept on in the Senate, vote against the bill as amended and justify myself to the country as best I can. A true soldier is never afraid to do right and stand by his convictions, while timid men start at shadows.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I desire to get a little information from the chairman of the Committee on Pensions if I can have his attention for a moment.

Mr. MITCHELL. I shall be glad to answer any questions I can.

Mr. BUTLER. I see by the amendment on page 2—

That every such officer, enlisted man, or widow who is or may become 62 years of age, or who is or may become subject to any disability or dependency equivalent to some cause prescribed or recognized by the pension laws of the United States as a sufficient reason for the allowance of a pension, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act.

What I want to get at from the chairman of the committee is, does not that practically exclude every soldier in the Mexican war and every widow of such a soldier from the benefits of this act, unless he or she is 62 years of age or unless his disability was incurred in the line of duty during that war?

Mr. MITCHELL. No, Mr. President, I think not very clearly. The reference is to the existing law for a definition of the disabilities; certain disabilities are now recognized under the existing pension laws, and this reference is made to the law in order to define the character of the disability. If a man has lost his arm in a thrashing-machine, that would be a disability if incurred in the line of duty, and of course it would be recognized by the existing pension law. This would cover a case of that kind.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there anything in the provisions of the pension laws as they now exist which entitles a soldier in the Union Army to a pension unless that disability can be traced to his duties.

Mr. MITCHELL. No, there is not.

Mr. BUTLER. Then that practically excludes soldiers of the Mexican war from any of the benefits of this act unless their disability or dependency was incurred in the line of their duty as soldiers in the Mexican war, so that it really and practically does not extend any benefit to the soldier of the Mexican war unless he or his widow is 62 years of age or can trace that disability back to the Mexican war.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think the Senator is mistaken in his construction. The reading is very clear, I think:

Or who is, or may become—

Any person enumerated in the fore part of the section—who is or may become subject to any disability.

Mr. BUTLER. As a matter of course, "disability" has a very well recognized legal significance, and, as I understand it, a disability must be incurred in the line of duty. So the Mexican war soldier must trace his disability or dependency to his duty as a Mexican war soldier; otherwise he does not get the benefit of this act.

Mr. GEORGE. Section 8 establishes a new rule on that subject.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not understand that that rule applies to this provision of the act. It simply applies to the soldiers of the Union Army.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Under that provision a Union soldier who stumps his toe or accidentally breaks his arm is entitled to the benefits of this act.

Mr. GEORGE. Allow me to correct the Senator on that subject.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir; but that is my construction of the amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. The amendment adopted yesterday evening reads:

That every such officer, enlisted man, or widow who is or may become 62 years of age.

When he gets to 62 years of age it is certain he is entitled to a pension.

Mr. BUTLER. No doubt about that.

Mr. GEORGE. Now, it continues:

Or who is or may become subject to any disability or dependency equivalent to some cause prescribed or recognized by the pension laws of the United States.

When this bill is passed, section 8 will be a part of the pension laws of the United States. There is nothing in section 1 which limits a disability to that kind which is recognized by the present pension laws of the United States. It applies as well to contemporaneous legislation as to future legislation, and whatever under the terms of section 1 may be at any time recognized by the law of the United States as a disability will apply to the Mexican war soldier under section 1.

Mr. BUTLER. Let us see. Of course the Senator is better informed about it than I am, as he is a member of the committee I believe; but let us see what section 8 says:

That every person specified in the several classes enumerated in section 4693 of the Revised Statutes of the United States——

Is the Mexican war soldier mentioned in section 4693 of the Revised Statutes?

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. It alludes entirely to Union soldiers, as I understand, and this refers to section 4693 of the Revised Statutes. All soldiers drawing pensions or who will draw pensions by reason of this provision served in the Army of the United States in the late war. The Mexican war soldiers are excluded from the benefit of it in terms, as I understand. Therefore I say that a natural construction of the proviso to section 1 would be that the disability must be traceable to an injury resulting from service in the war with Mexico, in the discharge of his duty in that war. That is my construction.

Mr. GEORGE. The answer to that is very plain. In section 1 disabilities are referred to; they are not defined. The definition must be taken from the general laws of the United States, from the pension laws of the United States. There is no attempt in section 1 to define disability. The whole object of that section is to put the Mexican war soldiers as to disability upon the same footing recognized by the pension laws of the United States for every other class of soldiers, and no other meaning can be given to it.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that. That is exactly what I claim for it. The word "disability" under the general pension laws means, as I have stated again and again, that the injury shall be traceable to the service of the soldier in the Mexican war.

Mr. GEORGE. But in section 8 there is a new class of disabilities provided for.

Mr. BUTLER. Now let me call the Senator's attention to section 8 for a moment to show that it has no sort of application to section 1, as I understand it:

SEC. 8. That every person specified in the several classes enumerated in section 4693 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and the amendments thereto—

Now mark the language—

who served in the military or naval service, as mentioned in said section, for the period of three months during the war of the rebellion, and has an honorable discharge therefrom, and who is or shall become disabled from any cause not the result of his own gross carelessness, disreputable conduct, or vicious habits, and shall also be dependent on his own labor for support, shall, upon making due proof of the facts, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the proper authority, be placed upon the list of pensioners of the United States.

That section refers exclusively to soldiers who served in the war of the rebellion, and has no reference whatever to, except to exclude, soldiers who served in the Mexican war.

Mr. GEORGE. I say that.

Mr. BUTLER. There is a definition, an extended definition, of the word "disability" not heretofore given under the general pension laws of the United States. I say, therefore, that the practical effect of that amendment will be, in my opinion, to exclude every Mexican war soldier from the benefits of this act, unless he is 62 years of age, or unless he can trace his disability back to the Mexican war and his service in that war. There is no other construction to be put upon it.

Now, if the Senator from Pennsylvania, the Chairman of the Committee on Pensions, will give me his attention for a moment, in order to remove all difficulty on that subject I will propose the following amendment to that proviso in section 1: strike out all after the word "dependency," in line 28, down to and including the word "pension," in line 31, and insert "whether incurred in the line of duty or not;" so that the proviso will read:

That every such officer, enlisted man, or widow who is or may become 62 years of age, or who is or may become subject to any disability or dependency, whether incurred in the line of duty or not, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act.

That makes it perfectly clear, and that I understand carries out the idea that the framer of the amendment had in offering it, and there can be no objection to it, it seems to me.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator who offered that amendment is now in his seat, and if he has given attention I should be glad to have him reply. I myself see no objection to the amendment suggested by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. WILSON. I have just come into the Chamber, and so am not aware of what the Senator from South Carolina has said.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I will restate for the information of the Senator from Iowa precisely my view of the amendment which, as I understand, he framed and offered to this bill. It is that under the amendment as it now stands no soldier of the Mexican war can get a pension under it, nor can his widow—but more especially now I am referring to the soldier—unless he is 62 years of age, or unless he is disabled in accordance with the provisions of the general pension laws of the United States, which, as I understand, mean that he shall trace the disability back to service in that war, and it must have been incurred in the line of duty.

Mr. WILSON. That is not the effect of the amendment at all. On the contrary, the amendment says in express terms:

That every such officer, enlisted man, or widow who is or may become 62 years of age, or who is or may become subject to any disability or dependency equivalent to some cause prescribed or recognized by the pension laws of the United States as a sufficient reason for the allowance of a pension, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act.

Now, the disability or dependency need not have occurred because of the service. If the soldier is at the present time subject to a disability which in its effects is equivalent to a disability for which, if incurred in the service, a pension would be granted, he will be entitled to receive his pension.

Mr. BUTLER. Who is to be the judge of that fact, whether it is equivalent or not?

Mr. WILSON. The Commissioner of Pensions, who administers this law, if it should become a law.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there any objection to the amendment I have just suggested, to strike out all after the word "dependency," in line 28, down to and including the word "pension," in line 31, and substitute "whether incurred in the line of duty or not?" That would make it perfectly clear.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator from South Carolina will allow me to suggest——

Mr. BUTLER. One moment, until I get the reply of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. WILSON. What is the suggestion?

Mr. BUTLER. After the word "dependency," in line 28, to strike out all down to and including the word "pension," in line 31, and substitute "whether incurred in the line of duty or not;" so as to read:

Who is or may become subject to any disability or dependency, whether incurred in the line of duty or not, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act.

Mr. WILSON. In the preparation of this amendment I have been guided in part by the advice of the Commissioner of Pensions, who says that in the administration of the existing law the rules are already established and perfectly understood under which this would be administered if it becomes a law, and that there will be no difficulty whatever in the understanding and administering the terms of this amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there any objection to making it more clear by the amendment I have suggested?

Mr. WILSON. I do not think it can be made more clear. In other words, I think this amendment makes it just as broad as it is possible to make it, and I drafted it for that purpose.

Mr. BUTLER. I then will offer the amendment to the amendment, which I suppose is in order, and ask for a vote on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). There is no amendment now pending. The amendment to which the Senator from South Carolina refers has already been adopted, and therefore is not open to amendment until the bill shall be reported to the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I reserve the right to move my amendment in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can do that.

Mr. BUTLER. I will state, now that I am on my feet, that if the amendment should be adopted I shall vote for the bill. I shall vote for it because I believe it will disappoint some of our friends on the other side who I think have introduced these various amendments for the purpose of defeating the bill for the relief of the Mexican war soldiers. I am satisfied it was done for that purpose, and for that alone; and, for me, I do not intend to gratify our friends on the other side by voting against this bill and thereby defeating what little there is in it of benefit to the Mexican war soldiers. I shall vote for the bill. I would very much have prefered that the amendments should have come up in the regular order and have been rested upon their own merits. I have voted pretty liberally for pensions for Union soldiers since I have been a member of the Senate, and have no objection to continuing so to vote. I think that the amendment of the bill to which I have called attention is unfair; I think it unjust, not that it may not be meritorious in itself, but it has been put on as a rider to the bill for the pensioning of the Mexican war soldiers for the express purpose of defeating that bill, and I do not intend to gratify the movers of the amendment by voting against the bill as amended.

Mr. WILSON. I suppose that the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina are not intended to apply to the amendments reported by the committee and presented by members of the Senate to the Mexican pension bill proper, inasmuch as it was entirely in accord with the rules of proceeding in this body that those amendments should be offered to the text of that bill. I know that from time to time we have been served with notice that no pension legislation could pass during the present session of Congress except the Mexican pension bill without amendment as it came from the House of Representatives. We did not propose to be put in any such position as that.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator will certainly do me the justice to say that I have served no such notice as that on the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. I am speaking of the notice which has been served in general from that side of the Chamber to us on this side.

Mr. BUTLER. I should be very glad to vote for any proper pension bill for the Union soldiers if it should be brought up in the regular order and the regular way. I have said so again and again, and I repeat it. As I said a while ago, believing that this was done for the purpose of defeating the Mexican pension bill, I shall vote for the bill nevertheless.

Mr. WILSON. These amendments have all been in order and have been in accordance with orderly parliamentary proceedings in this body. They were resorted to in part, so far as I am concerned, because of the notice served that there could be no legislation granting pensions to Union soldiers during this session of Congress. The Committee on Pensions and the members of the Senate on this side of the Chamber are perfectly content that pensions shall be provided for the Mexican war soldiers; but we are just as earnest in the determination that there shall be some provision made for the Union soldiers also; and when we were told in express terms that any amendment to the Mexican pension bill would defeat action upon it at this session because the House could not act with us, we regarded that as notice that any independent measure reported to the Senate and passed by the Senate would not be acted on and could not become a law.

Mr. BUTLER. May I interrupt the Senator a moment?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. My recollection of the debate is that that notice was served by the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] not now in his seat. The Senator can not certainly charge it to us.

Mr. WILSON. The honorable Senator from Illinois served no such notice, but it did come from several Senators on the other side, and notably from the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] who has taken such active interest in this bill.

Now the Senator from South Carolina says he is content to vote for this bill with the amendments, and will do so. I am glad to know it. I am in hopes that every Senator on that side will do the same thing, and that when the House shall have acted upon these amendments, as I have no doubt it will, as it certainly can, that we shall have provided a complete system of pensions, not only for the soldiers of the Mexican war, but also for the soldiers and their widows of the war of the rebellion who served in the Union Army.

Sir, there can be no difficulty whatever with reference to this bill in the other branch of Congress, and after we have put on an amendment to the Mexican bill, the same mode of procedure in the other House that would be required to pass the bill notwithstanding that amendment will carry it through even with all these amendments, and then we have got a system which provides for Union soldiers as well as Mexican war soldiers; and that is what we mean to do and what we mean to have.

Mr. FARLEY. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. FARLEY. Has it not been stated in the course of this debate that an amendment was offered to the Mexican pension bill, and the question was asked by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] whether that amendment was not intended to kill the bill? The Senator from Massachusetts the mover of the amendment, who is a prominent Senator and a candid one on that side of the Chamber, answered that such was his intention. I remember the honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] in his discussion the other day in reference to this bill referred to this very proposition that the Senator from Iowa must avow, that the Senator from Massachusetts admitted that his amendment was offered for the purpose of killing the Mexican pension bill.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator states substantially what occurred on that occasion. The Senator from Massachusetts is able doubtless to take care of himself. What motive he may have had beyond that stated I am not to judge; but I do not suppose he had any other. But so far as this side of the Senate as a body is concerned, no other purpose has controlled it than to use this opportunity, the only one we can have during this session of Congress, to provide pensions for the soldiers of the Union Army, and we mean to do it.

Mr. SLATER. Mr. President, I do not suppose anything that I might say on this measure will affect a vote in this body, but I am unwilling to allow the bill to pass without calling attention to some things that I think are foreshadowed as a result of its passage.

I have been willing all along, since I have occupied a seat in the Senate, to provide pensions for the Mexican war soldiers, and have voted for the various bills which have been before the Senate for that purpose on at least two or three different occasions, and have voted for the bill now pending up to the present stage; but with the amendments that are now adopted by the Senate I can not support it. I think I should be derelict in my duty as a Senator here—in that duty which I owe to the people of the whole country—in casting a vote for this measure; and I can not conceive that those who favor this measure with these amendments have stopped to consider the effect or calculated the result it must have upon the finances of this country.

By a very decided vote this body declared against an extension of the arrears-of-pensions act, and very properly in my judgment. They evidently foresaw in that proposition a vast expenditure of money; an expenditure on which we had at least reasonable and fair statistics to govern our judgment, but as to this measure as now amended, excepting in a few points, we have no data and no information as to what it will cost the country in money. It is a new feature in our pension system, one that has never been recognized in any former pension law that I have any knowledge of. It never has been a principle of any pension law to pension men for any disabilities not occurring in the line of duty and in the service of the United States, unless it be maintained that the pensioning of soldiers of the war of the Revolution at a late period and of the soldiers of the war of 1812 at a late period might be in some measure construed as coming within the purview of the amendments now attached to this bill.

We do know, Mr. President, that one year ago the annual value of the pension-roll was $33,000,000. The increase the present year will doubtless show that the value of the pension-roll is thirty-five or thirty-six million dollars at the present time. The provision of this bill which pensions the Mexican war soldiers will add from five to seven million dollars more. That which provides an increase of pension for the widows and that class will add four millions more, making in round numbers $9,000,000, to be added that we know of, that we can see, that is plainly before us, making at least forty-four or forty-five million dollars, when those items are added, saying nothing of the necessary increase that comes from year to year and which will continue to grow for many years to come.

Besides, heretofore there has been some benefit derived from the dropping from the pension-roll under various circumstances by death and otherwise of a large number, which under the provisions of these amendments will be stopped. Instead of the pension stopping, as now, others will step in and take them up and carry them along, so that instead of decrease by dropping, which seems every year to check the increase, we shall not have any decrease, but the increase will go on unchecked.

Beyond these figures, Mr. President, all is speculation, all is uncertainty. We know that there are 925,000 Union soldiers who, up to a year ago, had not made application for pension. At that time there had been 679,000 applications. It is safe to say then that at the close of the present year, which is now but a few days ahead of us, there will have been presented 700,000 pension claims. According to the ratio of allowance, there will be 20 per cent. of the 700,000 that will be passed upon and disallowed. That would be equal to 140,000. This amendment will serve to revive and bring into force all the claims of those who are living which have been rejected; thus at least 125,000 claims that are now on the files of the office which have been rejected or will be rejected under the present laws no man can estimate or calculate what per cent. of the 925,000 will be entitled to come in under this amendment. It is a drag-net. It is absolutely a bill that no one can fathom or measure the expenditures it will call for. Any attempt at it is but guesswork; and yet if Senators will look around and note the condition of those soldiers he may know in his neighborhood and among his acquaintances, he will discover that more than one-fourth of those 925,000 are disabled in some degree or other and will be entitled to go on the pension-roll, so that at least of that number 250,000 will be entitled to go on immediately, and the number will be constantly increasing from year to year.

The present rating of each pension claim or pensioner is $106 per annum. Putting it, however, at only $96, or $8 a month, the 250,000 would make $24,000,000 to be added to the $45,000,000 already referred to, saying nothing of the 140,000 rejected cases that are standing upon the files of the Department, which would add at the least calculation $15,000,000 more. So then, sir, you will have here not merely a doubling of the present pension ratings but nearly a trebling of them. Any person who will take up this subject and consider it, looking at the numbers that must necessarily come upon the pension-roll, with the number of cases which stand as rejected, and will be rejected, and will be revived, and the cases that are now filed and which will be allowed under present laws, will see that if this bill as amended becomes a law of the United States it will not be five years until your annual pension-roll will exceed $100,000,000.

Now, sir, with these facts before me, with the certainty that this is a correct and fair estimate, in my judgment far below what will be the real results of the bill, I can not support it, although I am very desirous that the Mexican soldiers should be accorded a pension, and also very desirous that the widows referred to in this amendment should have precisely what is there stipulated for them. I might say that I have suggested in the proper quarter that a separate bill for the widows should be reported to the Senate.

Six months ago I do not believe that this bill in its present shape would have received a dozen votes in this Chamber. There are considerations which have brought this here that in my judgment ought not to weigh with Senators. When the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] opened his remarks a few days ago, he began with reading a letter that he had received from a person, a soldier, I believe, in answer to some letter I think that the Senator had written to him. The letter that was read is as follows:

What you say about the length of time that intervened between the close of the Revolutionary and other wars before service pensions were granted only shows the absolute necessity of our action now. There are 1,400,000 of us now. We have a powerful organization, and we can carry this country on this issue now. If we wait as did the veterans of the Revolution until we are few and weak, we will be treated as they were. This House of Representatives will vote for this bill or the soldiers will elect a new House that will. This Senate will vote for it or we will make a Senate that will. The same with the President. We are not Democrats or Republicans, but we are soldiers, and we mean business now.

And, Mr. President, during the three years I have served on the Pensions Committee I have received more than one just such epistle as that; and here to-day we have the spectacle of the Republican party, the Senators on that side of the Chamber, capitulating to this element, for that is what it is, and nothing more can be made out of it. Perhaps an interpretation might be placed upon that language that would be severe, but taking the history of this legislation, taking the circumstances that are occurring around us, taking the action of the Chicago convention only a few days ago and what has occurred here since, I repeat that I am justified in the conclusion that I have drawn from these circumstances that it is a capitulation of the Republican party to this demand of the soldier element.

I do not believe that the country will justify it. I do not believe that the country will justify this kind of legislation. There has come up here in various ways from all classes of the community the country over a demand for retrenchment and reduction of taxation. Put this bill on your statute-book and before eighteen months have passed you will be compelled to find additional revenues and new sources of taxation. Your revenues will not be adequate to meet the demands that will be made upon your Treasury, and you will have to levy new taxes to meet it. You will have no means of reducing taxation. Instead of a reduction, taxation will have to be increased and its burdens made heavier year by year as they go on and more and more of these soldiers come upon your pension-roll.

This is all I desire to say. These are the reasons which will influence my vote. I must vote against this bill as it stands now.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania for information about this bill as amended. I suppose the Senator knows how much this amendment is going to cost the country. I should like to have a statement of what the cost is as estimated by the members of the committee who are advocating the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. I stated yesterday that unless the Senate desired explanation I had nothing to say in regard to the matter which had been generally considered. The estimates made by the Commissioner of Pensions were laid before the Senate some days ago. As I went over them some days ago I judged that the amendment proposed to the bill would increase the annual list perhaps $10,000,000 or $12,000,000. I judged that from the statement made by the Commissioner of Pensions. But, as I stated then, there is very great uncertainty in regard to estimates in all cases like this, and he so states in his communication. It is impossible for anybody to tell how many of these soldiers in the late war who have never applied for a pension may come forward now and apply if this bill becomes a law. It is very difficult to have any basis upon which to form an estimate. It is only on the general judgment of Senators that we are able to act. So far as my own observation goes, I think nearly all soldiers who have any present disability have already applied for a pension, and that practically this legislation will only affect those who have applications on file now undisposed of.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Senator whether the phase of the case that is now presented, in the amendment which the Senator voted on the bill yesterday afternoon, is the same phase in respect of which the Commissioner of Pensions made an estimate that it would cost $246,000,000?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is almost precisely the same thing; the wording of the section is a little different, not including the arrears. The arrears, of course, are stricken out by the action of the Senate, or rather the Senate declined to adopt that provision.

I did not, perhaps, correctly hear the Senator's remark. I supposed he referred to arrears. The estimate of the Commissioner of Pensions which is published in Miscellaneous Document 107 of the Senate covers what is known in common parlance as the Cullom amendment; that is, it is Senate bill 2208 in substance. The amendments which I offered yesterday are almost precisely the same as that bill.

Mr. MORGAN. And they are the amendments in respect of which the Commissioner computed that they would require $246,000,000?

Mr. MITCHELL. No, sir; not at all. It is an entirely different communication. The communication of the Commissioner of Pensions will be found on the fourth page of that document, and it is dated June 12, while the one to which the Senator refers was dated April 1. That relates simply to arrears; this communication of the 12th of June relates to bill 2208, known as the Cullom bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, will the Senator oblige me by stating how much the Commissioner estimates the cost of this amendment?

Mr. MITCHELL. The Commissioner's estimate altogether—perhaps I may as well state the figures—amounts to $12,458,560.

Mr. MORGAN. A year?

Mr. MITCHELL. Annual increase.

Mr. MORGAN. Twelve millions and a half. Mr. President, I have stated heretofore in the Senate, in conformity with the course I have observed since I have had the honor of a place in this body, that I was willing at any time to vote pensions to the Union soldiers whenever the people among whom they reside, the Northern representatives in this House and in the other, determine that the time has arrived for their being pensioned. I look upon the pension laws, following the civil war of 1861 to 1865, as being a part of the results of the war. We have never yet had any general war that was not followed by a pension-list; I suppose we never shall have one; and some Senators, including the honorable Senator from Kentucky, insist that a pension-list is a safety-valve to follow a war, that it is a good institution. If I were opposed to pensions, I should despair in the present state of the public mind either of dispensing with them or reducing them.

I can not say that I am opposed to pensions. I can not say that I am opposed to a government expressing its gratitude to its soldiers, after the events of the war have passed, for the services they have rendered, in the form of compensation to them to enable them to meet the ills of advancing age and infirmity. I therefore am willing at any time the Northern people demand pensions from the Government of the United States to vote them as one of the results of the war which I consider that the people whom I represent have fully and in good faith accepted. I only desire that the people of the North shall have this subject considered by them, through their representatives on this floor and in the other House, under circumstances separate and apart from political commotion.

I think that we undervalue ourselves and the people when we make a pension law the subject of political differences, when we ring it into a political campaign for the purpose of putting men in apparent opposition to it because of their supposed party affiliations. That is not a just way to treat a soldier. He ought to be pensioned, if at all, not because he is a Republican or a Democrat, a white man, a black man, or a red man, but because he was a faithful soldier of his country under circumstances that require of that country, as an expression of gratitude, to give him a pension in his old age or whenever he becomes decrepit or infirm.

It has been to me a very painful reflection when I have observed the course which has been pursued in the Senate during this debate and during the pendency of this bill, whereby this subject has been deprived of every other than a mere political complexion. I have felt that the Senate in considering this bill was dealing with some of the most sacred things that we are called upon to consider. When a government comes to express its gratitude to its soldiery it ought to be able to do it freely upon the merits of the question, and a sense of honor and of duty on the part of the representatives of that government requires that they should take the circumstances into just consideration aside from all political influences or bias.

The people of the Northern States, in my humble judgment, have not demanded that the pensions proposed in the amendments put upon this bill are now due. The committee having charge of this subject, representing the Republican party and the majority of the Northern people, have not been able to mature and bring in a bill during this session for the purpose included in this amendment. They have delayed to prepare such a measure until another bill has come up which has been for many years before the Congress of the United States, which has been before all the Legislatures of the States, and twenty-eight of them have instructed in favor of it, and they now suddenly put upon this bill, as a rider, this new device, which has not received the sanction of the Committee on Pensions.

Now, sir, I would not like to reproach the Committee on Pensions of the Senate, but, in view of the haste with which they bring this measure in as a rider upon the Mexican pension bill, I am compelled to say that the country has a right to reproach them with a want of diligence and attention to their interests. Either that committee did not believe that the public opinion of the Northern States demanded the passage of a bill such as is presented now in the form of this amendment which is voted on this bill, or else they have been delinquent in not bringing that bill before the Senate as an independent measure and putting it upon its passage.

Sir, if that committee had brought such a bill in and put it upon its passage after full deliberation upon it and after they had become able to state what its effects were to be upon the country, I, for one, would have voted for it. Take the proposition upon its merits, after the committee have examined it and after they are able—which they are not now—to tell us the effect of it. I, for one, would have been willing to vote for it. I would not hesitate to assume on the part of my constituency that much of a debt that I considered to be due whenever the people of the North demanded it at the hands of the people of the South, and of the entire country. I am not going to repudiate that debt whenever it is properly stated, in due form, upon a demand made by the people of the North through their representatives; and when, after fair consideration on their part, they come forward as committees of the Houses and assume the responsibility of it, I will not vote against it. I have announced my position on this subject on this floor time and again, and not only have I announced it but I have voted that I was in favor of the pensioning of the soldiers of the late war as a debt due from the country whenever the people of the North said that it was due.

Sir, I have been in the Senate for eight years, and I never heard a man on the Democratic side state anything else than his willingness to vote pensions for the Northern soldiers. Even when the bill for the purpose of paying the arrearage of pensions came up in 1879 there were but four votes against that bill, and my recollection is that not one of them came from the late seceding States. I declined to vote on that bill. I have seen pension bill after pension bill pass the Senate, appropriation bills for pensions, increase of officers provided for the purpose of getting pensions rapidly through the different departments of the Government; I have seen individual pensions pressed through this body from time to time, and I never yet heard a man from one of the seceding States raise his voice against one of them.

I have scarcely ever known in any instance a Senator from the South to vote against any of them. The fact is we felt embarrassed by the situation to that extent that we have hardly had fair liberty of action, but we have thrown the weight of our influence and our votes uniformly upon the side of liberal pensions according to the demand made upon us, and not according to our individual opinions perhaps of the justice arrived at in every particular case. That is the true statement of our attitude on the subject. Now, the object, of course, in forcing this amendment on the bill is a political one; it is to press us to the wall. The object is, because we are not satisfied that these pensions are due in accordance with the deliberate judgment of the Northern people, to make it appear to the country that we are opposed to pensioning the Northern soldiers because of the antagonism that we held to them in the war of the rebellion.

Mr. President, I do not wish to make any improper or invidious remarks, but I will say that that side of the Chamber is represented by honorable soldiery, some confederates and some Republicans. I do not find in the votes upon this proposition any discrimination between the confederates and the Republicans on that side of the Chamber. They stand together; they vote any demand that the recent Chicago convention has seen proper to force upon this body; they vote solidly, and that, too, without the aid of reasonable deliberation by a committee; and they vote it in presence of the fact that not one member of the committee can tell us what this bill, as amended, will cost the country.

We are even appealed to upon the ground of a proper response to generous action to vote not only for this particular phase of the case, but for one which was broken down yesterday by the joint votes of Democrats and Republicans, the arrears measure.

It was stated by the honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] the other day in debate that we on this side had no difficulty in voting something like a hundred million dollars out of the Treasury for the purpose of educating the poor people of the South, but that when it came to voting pensions to the Union soldiers we were not willing to vote a cent. That honorable Senator forgot, perhaps, if he ever knew, that there are at least some Senators on this side of the Chamber who argued and voted against that measure, and who at that time admonished their brethren on this side, that the account would be thus stated against them, and that they would be required to vote anything that might come up hereafter on the ground that it had been paid for in advance by the school bill. I do not occupy that attitude. Notwithstanding my State would get more than a million dollars a year for ten years under that bill, I argued against it and voted against it. So the argument does not hold good that I, though a Southern man, am under a different obligation from any other man on this floor to vote for or against the pension bill.

I represent a tax-paying community, one of the sovereign States of the Union. I come from a country that contributes more than three hundred millions a year out of a single crop to the actual commerce of the country; and while I do not intrude my voice or my opinions in the settlement of these pension questions upon Northern men or Northern communities, I still have a right to ask the Senate to pause in so rapidly increasing the drafts upon the public Treasury until you can ascertain whether the people are able to bear it.

Your present tax laws bear down most heavily upon the substratum of society. They bear like the waters do upon the bottom of the sea, growing heavier toward the bottom; they bear like the atmosphere does upon the bosom of the earth, growing heavier as it comes in contact with the soil. Those men who are at the bottom of the great mass of taxation raised by tariff and internal-revenue taxation are the men who receive the heaviest pressure of the burden.

We have large classes of men in this country who are exempt from taxation. They hold Government securities; they have corporation stocks that bring them vast sums of money which are not taxed; they exercise illicit pursuits in various portions of the country that impoverish the people always while it enriches the few, but they are very lightly taxed. The burden of the tariff taxation rests upon the common men of the land, upon the tillers of the soil, the delvers in the mines, the hewers in the forests, and the sailors upon the seas. There is where the burden is, and as an American Senator I have a right to look to both sides of this question and to all classes who are affected by it. I have a right, and it is my duty, to look to the man who is receiving a bounty from the Government and then to turn my eyes to the man who is to be taxed to raise the money to pay it.

If to-day I could lay this burden of taxation upon those men who accumulated their millions during the time that the war was in progress by speculations and by Government contracts while they remained at home and sent their substitutes into the Army, then I would be willing to allow the people of the North at any time to price the service, and I would vote to pay it. Take your candidate for the Presidency. He was a valiant talker in the war, but he never went to the war. He remained at home and accumulated his millions of dollars, and his substitute went to the war.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; the substitute did not go.

Mr. MORGAN. Why did he not go?

Mr. WILLIAMS. He got a furlough to stay at home.

Mr. MORGAN. He ought to have gone. At least one o the membership of that combination ought to have gone.

Mr. President, if you will lay the heavy hand of the taxing power upon the people let it be upon the men who staid at home and hired their substitutes and accumulated their millions of money. I shall vote with you to make your largesses or your subscriptions of patriotism to your soldiers, just as much as you want, if you will raise the money upon the internal-revenue taxation, which is a war tax and ought to be applied to the extinguishment of the debt we owe for pensions. I shall vote with you to the extent of that war tax if you will distribute it properly; and you may take the bounties and distribute them among your people as you please; I shall not ask you a question about it.

But when you take for your subject of taxation a man who was in the South and in the confederate army, and who was as gallant a man as any you ever saw or ever fought, and as honorable, who has lost his limbs, his arms, or his eyes, all that he had to toil with, and you tax the blanket upon which the poor fellow has got to sleep, and the very iron tips upon his crutches as he pulls himself about over the world, and the clothes he has to purchase for his poor wife and his children, I have the right to ask you to forbear. When you lay that burden upon the woolens that he must wear in winter and the coarse cottons his family must wear in summer, when you tax at a large sum the iron with which he hoes his little crop, if he is able to limp about to work it, or with which he plows it if he can get across his fields, you bring the pressure down upon the poor fellow when struggling for existence, and I beg you to forbear.

I ask you in the name of God and humanity to forbear. I appeal to the benevolence of the soldier's heart who shot him down in honorable warfare, and who felt that he was fighting a brave man when he shot him, and I say do not make that man forever tributary to paying your pensions; do not tax the clothing, the blankets, the shoes that he is able to get together for his impoverished family to pay yourself a bounty. That man gave you the glory that you boast of by the prowess with which he fought you. In the coming campaign, when referring to that heroic man from Illinois who stands second upon your ticket, and who was a heroic man in Mexico and in the late war, when you speak about his plumes—not the white plume of Navarre, worn in battle by a substitute, but the red pompon of the soldier, dyed in the blood of his adversary—when you come to speak of that in order that his heroism may appear in its true colors, you must draw in the background of the picture the heroic confederate soldier also to make the picture complete; for if the confederate soldier had been a cowardly, half-hearted, unpatriotic, and untrue man, who would shrink from death or run from his flag, John A. Logan's glory would have been confined to his triumphs in his youth on the battlefields of Mexico.

We are all Americans, Mr. President. I am proud of the men who stood up against us in the war. Whatever other men who did not go to the war may think of us, those men are proud of us. There is no difficulty in our fellowship. There is no difficulty in our meeting each other face to face and debating about the affairs of this country in the past or in the future, its honor and its glory, its duty and its rights in every particular. No honest confederate soldier will shrink from a demand made upon him which is one of the real results of that war. None of them have ever done it and none will ever do it. Here we stand face to face, and I pledge them to this country for the faithful performance of every duty.

As a man who went into the war as a private soldier, who went in, as I believed, in accordance with a strict sense of duty, I have the right on the floor of the Senate to say to the men who now demand an additional $12,000,000 or $20,000,000 or $100,000,000 a year from the people of the United States for pensions to the conquering army, "Gentlemen, forbear, and do not tax those men who are at the bottom of the wave; do not tax those upon whom all the pressure comes any more heavily than you are now doing, but consider what they have done and what they have suffered, what they are and what they once were, and give them at least a chance in life." Sir, it seems to me that if I were a Union soldier and derived a pension from the Government of the United States I would starve before receiving it if I knew that it had been taxed out of the necessities of some poor wounded, crippled confederate soldier who was obliged to pay the tax because he was obliged to have subsistence, something to keep his soul and body together.

Now, sir, these are my honest sentiments if I ever expressed them in my life, and I should be ashamed of myself if I did not have the courage to vote against a bill which is put in here not with the honest and real intent of giving pensions to the Union soldiers, but for the mere purpose of getting up a make-weight in the pending political campaign. Whenever you present a pension bill in good faith, when your committee will come forward and indorse it, when your people demand it, when you will discuss it with us upon its merits, I shall vote for it, but I shall not be dragooned into voting for it because I may be put in a false attitude in the mind of any man in the world because I once belonged to the confederate army.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6656) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the Senate to the bill (S. 2243) to authorize foot and carriage or railroad bridges across the Mississippi River at Saint Paul, in the State of Minnesota, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WILLIAM D. WASHBURN of Minnesota, Mr. L. H. WELLER of Iowa, and Mr. SAMUEL R. PETERS of Kansas managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6094) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHN HANCOCK of Texas, Mr. JOHN F. FOLLETT of Ohio, and Mr. WILLIAM D. WASHBURN of Minnesota managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3961) to grant to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. OLIN WELLBORN of Texas, Mr. RICE A. PIERCE of Tennessee, and Mr. BISHOP W. PERKINS of Kansas managers at the conference on the part of the House.

FOURTH OF JULY CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5377) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department, and asking for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments to the bill and agree to the committee of conference asked for by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. CAMERON of Wisconsin, Mr. MANDERSON, and Mr. GEORGE were appointed.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the bill (S. 312) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at the city of Leavenworth, Kans., having been presented to the President on the 11th instant, and not having been returned by him to the Senate, wherein it originated, within ten days (Sundays excepted), as prescribed by the Constitution, had become a law without his approval.

The message also announced that the President had on the 24th instant approved and signed the following bills:

An act (S. 282) granting a pension to A. M. Wilson; and

An act (S. 820) to authorize the Oregon Pacific Railroad Company to construct one or more bridges across the Willamette River, in the State of Oregon, and to establish them as post-roads.

MEXICAN WAR PENSIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5667) granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes.

Mr. JACKSON. In section 1, line 21, after the word "men," I move to strike out the words:

As were married to such officers, or soldiers, or sailors prior to the discharge of such officers and enlisted men.

So as to read:

Who, being duly enlisted, actually served fourteen days with the Army or Navy of the United States in Mexico, or on the coasts or frontier thereof, or en route thereto, in the war with that nation, or were actually engaged in a battle in said war, and were honorably discharged, and to such other officers and soldiers and sailors as may have been personally named in any resolution of Congress for any specific service in said war, although their term of service may have been less than sixty days, and the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted men: Provided, That such widows have not remarried.

The purpose of the amendment is to give the benefit of the pension to the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted men. It is the same amendment that was reported by the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] to present the amendment which he indicated to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] this morning that he would be willing to support. I should be very glad if he would offer it.

Mr. BLAIR. I indicated a willingness on my part to support an amendment which should place the soldiers of the Mexican war and the widows of such soldiers upon the same ground as to the rating for pensions as the soldiers of the late war and the widows of such soldiers, upon proof of precisely the same conditions. I should be glad to support such an amendment. I have one partially written, but if any Senator who is specially interested in the soldiers of the Mexican war has one prepared that covers those points I should be glad to support it.

Mr. GEORGE. I have none. I relied on the Senator from New Hampshire to prepare one. I think it would be a very just amendment. I desire to vote for the bill, and expect to do so, and I should be glad if anything that looked like an unjust discrimination between the soldiers of the Mexican war and any other soldiers of the United States were taken out of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senate to the fact that the hour of 3 o'clock has arrived, at which time it was agreed by unanimous consent that all debate should cease upon the bill and pending amendments.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to call attention to a typographical error in the spelling of the word "naval" in the eighth section, fourth line. The "t" should be "l," so as to read "naval."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That correction will be made.

Mr. MITCHELL. In section 8, line 26, after the word "any," I move to strike out the word "such" and to insert the same word after "for;" so as to read:

But any applicant for such invalid pension having an application therefor pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is not strictly in order now, but will be when the bill is reported to the Senate. However, as it is merely formal it can be agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to amend section 8 as he has stated. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, if in order, I will offer an additional section, which is a mere safeguard. I move to add as a new section:

SEC. —. That no person shall be entitled to more than one pension at the same time under any or all laws of the United States, whether such pension shall have been already obtained or shall be hereafter obtained, unless the act under which such pension is claimed shall specially so declare.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question on agreeing to the amendment?

Mr. MITCHELL. I suppose it is not in order to debate it, and I do not presume it is necessary. It is merely a safeguard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I move to add at the end of the second section, following the amendment already adopted to the second section, this additional proviso:

And provided further, That every person who served in the Army or Navy in the Mexican war, and the widow of every such person, who are entitled to pension under the provisions of the first section of this act, shall be paid at the rate provided in section 8 and section 9 of this act, upon making due proof of the same facts therein required to be proven in order to establish a right to pension under those sections.

Mr. INGALLS. I rise to an inquiry. What is the rate mentioned in sections 8 and 9? The amendment is not clear, and I ask the question for information, but not to violate the order about debate.

Mr. BLAIR. That is pointed out in the sections themselves.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask what is the amount named?

Mr. BLAIR. Twenty-four dollars, divisible down to the lowest rate, and to a widow $12. It places the two classes of soldiers and widows upon precisely the same ground.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether he is not confusing this thing? The pension allowed to soldiers of the Mexican war by the provisions of the bill as it passed the House is $8 irrespective of disability. Under the clause the pension may not amount to $2. If this amendment be adopted the whole thing is thrown into confusion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The debate proceeds by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLAIR. It is in the nature of debate, but it is proper I suppose since the statement has been made to reply to it.

A proviso attached to the second section fixes $8 at least as the rate for every pensioner of the Mexican war. My amendment simply gives from $8 up to $24, with the same opportunity the Union soldier has, to the soldier of the Mexican war, and to the widow of the soldier of the Mexican war precisely the same as to the widow of the Union soldier in all cases of the same class.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senate will give me unanimous consent to say that the pension to the soldier of the late war is not absolutely $8; it may not be more than $2, and if this amendment is adopted it gives a soldier of the Mexican war absolutely $8 for any degree of disability, and then gives him an opportunity to have more than $8 under the provisions of the section referred to, which is not equality at all.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I shall be obliged to object to any further debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts objects to all further debate.

Mr. PLATT. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The amendment was read.

Mr. BLAIR. The whole section should be read, and the Senator would see precisely the force of the whole proposition.

Mr. PLATT. The amendment gives persons 62 years old $24.

Mr. BLAIR. Oh, no; not at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate has been objected to. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BLAIR called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ALDRICH answered to his name.

Mr. BROWN. Let the amendment be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia asks that the amendment be again read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I understand the amendment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed with the call of the roll.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There was so much noise that I could hardly hear the amendment. I wanted before the vote to understand what the Senator from New Hampshire proposes to accomplish by the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll-call had been commenced, and was only suspended by unanimous consent.

Mr. SEWELL. I desire to make an inquiry. Does the amendment include striking out the present proviso in section 2?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is added to that.

Mr. SEWELL. If it does not include the striking out of that proviso it makes two rates, one at $8 a month——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is in the nature of argument, and no further debate is allowable. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded with the roll-call.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HILL (when his name was called). I was paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], but I have transferred that pair to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. SEWELL. I am paired on this question with my colleague [Mr. MCPHERSON].

Mr. HALE (after having voted in the negative). I wish to withdraw my vote, as I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]. I see he is not present. If he were here, I should vote "nay" and he would vote "yea."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote will be withdrawn if there be no objection.

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Bayard,	Colquitt,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Blair,	Farley,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Garland,	Lamar,	Slater,
Butler,	George,	Maxey,	Vance,
Call,	Groome,	Morgan,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Pendleton,	Walker,
Coke,	Jackson,	Pugh,	Williams.

NAYS—29.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	McMillan,	Plumb,
Allison,	Frye,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Bowen,	Harrison,	Miller of N. Y.,	Sherman,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hawley,	Mitchell,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill,	Morrill,	Wilson.
Conger,	Ingalls,	Palmer,
Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Pike,
Dolph,	Lapham,	Platt,

ABSENT—19.

Anthony,	Gibson,	Kenna,	Riddleberger,
Beck,	Gorman,	Logan,	Sabin,
Camden,	Hale,	McPherson,	Sewell,
Cullom,	Harris,	Mahone,	Voorhees.
Fair,	Hoar,	Miller of Cal.,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In section 1, line 21, after the word "men," I move to strike out the words:

As were married to such officers or soldiers or sailors prior to the discharge of such officers and enlisted men.

Mr. HARRIS. That amendment has already been adopted.

Mr. JACKSON. It was agreed to on my motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. All right. Then while I am up, in section 6——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky withdraw his amendment to section 1?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I am told that it has been already adopted. In section 6, I move to strike out all after the word "repealed," in line 2; so as to make the section read:

That section 4716 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed.

My amendment strikes out the words:

So far as the same relates to this act or to pensioners under this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Kentucky that previously to this time the same motion has been made and disagreed to, so that a new motion to strike out these words is not now in order. It will be in order after the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. CALL. I move to add as an additional section to the bill the following:

SEC. —. That the surviving soldiers who served for three months in either the volunteer or regular service of the United States in the Black Hawk and Creek and Seminole Indian wars, and the other Indian wars between the United States and the Indians, who are dependent upon their manual labor for support and are disabled, or who have attained the age of 62 years, and the widows and children of deceased soldiers of the same classes as the widows and children of the war of the rebellion herein provided for, shall receive the same pension and the same rate of pension as herein provided for the soldiers of the war of the rebellion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 21, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Brown,	Fair,	Maxey,	Vest,
Butler,	Garland,	Morgan,	Walker,
Call,	George,	Pendleton,	Williams.
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Pugh,
Coke,	Jonas,	Slater,
Colquitt,	Jones of Florida,	Vance,

NAYS—31.

Aldrich,	Conger,	Ingalls,	Morrill,
Allison,	Dawes,	Lapham,	Pike,
Bayard,	Dolph,	Logan,	Platt,
Beck,	Frye,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Hale,	Manderson,	Sherman,
Bowen,	Harrison,	Miller of Cal.,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hawley,	Miller of N. Y.,	Wilson.
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill,	Mitchell,

ABSENT—24.

Anthony,	Gorman,	Kenna,	Ransom,
Camden,	Groome,	Lamar,	Riddleberger,
Cullom,	Harris,	McPherson,	Sabin,
Edmunds,	Hoar,	Mahone,	Saulsbury,
Farley,	Jackson,	Palmer,	Sewell,
Gibson,	Jones of Nevada,	Plumb,	Voorhees.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no further amendment be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL. Would it be in order to move to strike out that portion of section 9 which was inserted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order to move to strike out any part of section 9 which has been inserted by a vote of the Senate. It is not in order even to move to strike out and insert. That section has been agreed to as an amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. It will be in order when the bill is in the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be in order in the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate concur in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. MITCHELL. Before that question is taken I desire to amend section 9 by striking out after the word "duty," in line 6, the words:

Since the 4th day of March, 1861.

If this amendment is adopted it will place all the widows whose husbands died in the service, or of wounds contracted in the service, upon the same footing—that is, the soldiers of the Mexican war and the war of 1812, as well as the late war.

Mr. INGALLS. Giving them all arrears back to the time of discharge?

Mr. MITCHELL. There are no arrears.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 9, line 6, after the word "duty," it is proposed to strike out the words "since the 4th day of March, 1861;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 9. That all widows or minor children of soldiers and sailors who as such are now receiving, under existing laws, general or special, the sum of $8 per month, by reason of the death of such soldiers and sailors in service or from a disability contracted in the military or naval service of the United States, and in line of duty, shall, from and after this date, be entitled to and receive the rate of $12 per month in lieu of said rate of $8; and all such widows or minor children who shall hereafter be found to be entitled to the rate of $8 per month under existing laws shall be entitled to and receive the rate of $12 in lieu of said rate of $8.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania to an amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. In section 8, line 6, after the word "rebellion," I move to insert the words "and every person who rendered like service in the Mexican war."

We have by the amendment just adopted provided for the widows. This will take care of the soldiers.

Mr. ALLISON. Debate is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 8, line 6, after the word "rebellion," it is proposed to insert "and every person who rendered like service in the Mexican war;" so as to read:

SEC. 8. That every person specified in the several classes enumerated in section 4693 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and the amendments thereto, who served in the military or naval service, as mentioned in said section, for the period of three months during the war of the rebellion, and every person who rendered like service in the Mexican war, and has an honorable discharge therefrom, and who is or shall become disabled, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire to an amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. I should like to hear the amendment read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. If it is in order I should like to inquire whether that does not give double pensions to the soldiers of the Mexican war.

Mr. BLAIR. The bill provides that no double pension shall be paid in any case.

Mr. SHERMAN. This would be inconsistent.

Mr. BLAIR. I beg leave to say that in section 9 we have already provided for the widows of the soldiers of the Mexican war, placing them on precisely the same ground as those of the war for the Union. This has the same effect with reference to soldiers.

Mr. PLATT. I find that unanimous consent is being given to make suggestions. It strikes me that to insert this amendment where it is proposed would do away entirely with the proviso at the end of the first section, that the soldiers of the Mexican war should not be pensioned who incurred disability "while in any manner voluntarily engaged in or aiding or abetting the late rebellion against the authority of the United States."

Mr. MORGAN. May I be permitted to say that the incorporation of these two provisions in the same statute does not cause the latter one to nullify or repeal the first. They stand together and must be construed together as parts of the same law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. If I were not paired, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], but the pair has been transferred to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN]. My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. MCMILLAN. My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Bayard,	Coke,	Hampton,	Pugh,
Beck,	Colquitt,	Jackson,	Slater,
Blair,	Fair,	Jonas,	Vance,
Brown,	Farley,	Jones of Florida,	Vest,
Butler,	Garland,	Maxey,	Walker,
Call,	George,	Morgan,	Williams.
Cockrell,	Groome,	Pendleton,

NAYS—30.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Lapham,	Pike,
Allison,	Frye,	McMillan,	Platt,
Bowen,	Hale,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.	Harrison,	Miller of Cal.,	Sherman,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hawley,	Miller of N. Y.,	Van Wyck,
Conger,	Hill,	Mitchell,	Wilson.
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Morrill,
Dolph,	Jones of Nevada,	Palmer,

ABSENT—19.

Anthony,	Harris,	McPherson,	Sabin,
Camden,	Hoar,	Mahone,	Saulsbury,
Cullom,	Kenna,	Plumb,	Sewell,
Gibson,	Lamar,	Ransom,	Voorhees.
Gorman,	Logan,	Riddleberger,

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In section 6, line 2, after the word "repealed," I move to strike out the words:

So far as the same relates to this act or to pensioners under this act.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. That section 4716 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed.

I move this amendment to make it in harmony with the other amendments that have been made. Section 4716 of the Revised Statutes forbids the paying of pensions to persons——

Mr. INGALLS. I do not object to debate if it is to be general.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I do not make it general. I simply want to state my views. [Laughter.]

Mr. INGALLS. That is all anybody else wants to do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will please be in order. The Senator from Kentucky is entitled to the floor, and must not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There are several hundred meritorious men who were wounded and disabled in the Mexican war, who were on the pension-rolls drawing pensions, but by that section of the Revised Statutes they were stricken from the rolls. Many of them have since been endeavoring to get back upon the pension-rolls. Now we are putting soldiers of the Mexican war on the pension-rolls; and why should we keep the wounded ones off? They were not engaged in the late war, but they lived unfortunately in Southern States. It seems to me that in harmony with the whole tenor of the amendments they ought to be put on the roll. I do not see any necessity in the world for keeping the wounded men off and letting the well men on.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask that section 4716 of the Revised Statutes may be read at the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the section of the Revised Statutes be read. It will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4716. No money on account of pension shall be paid to any person, or to the widow, children or heirs of any deceased person, who in any manner voluntarily engaged in, or aided or abetted, the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nobody wants that to stand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the confusion the Chair omitted to notice that this amendment, which had been acted upon as in Committee of the Whole, was rejected, which left the language to stand as part of the text. The present question is on concurring in the amendments that were made as in Committee of the Whole. The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky therefore is not at this moment in order. The Chair will first put the question on concurring in the amendments that were made as in Committee of the Whole, after which the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky will be in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not understand the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair states that the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky is proposed to the text of the bill. An amendment of a similar character was proposed as in Committee of the Whole and rejected, which left the text to stand. Other amendments were made as in Committee of the Whole which have not yet been disposed of, and those amendments must be disposed of before the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky will be in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. After they are disposed of it will be in order for me to move the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then it will be in order.

Mr. BUTLER. I have a similar amendment to offer, and so I shall withhold it also.

Mr. BLAIR. I move to amend the bill in section 8 by inserting, after the word "rebellion," in line 6, the words:

And every person who rendered like service in the Mexican war, who did not incur disability while in any manner voluntarily engaged in aiding or abetting the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

So as to read:

SEC. 8. That every person specified in the several classes enumerated in section 4693 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and the amendments thereto, who served in the military or naval service, as mentioned in said section, for the period of three months during the war of the rebellion, and every person who rendered like service in the Mexican war who did not incur disability while in any manner voluntarily engaged in aiding or abetting the late rebellion against the authority of the United States, and has an honorable discharge therefrom, and who is or shall become disabled from any cause not the result of his own gross carelessness, disreputable conduct, or vicious habits, and shall also be dependent on his own labor for support, shall, upon making due proof of the facts, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the proper authority, be placed upon the list of pensioners of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire to an amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARRISON. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he does not know that he is either introducing here a double pension or is throwing the bill into inextricable confusion. The first section——

Mr. INGALLS. I object to debate.

Mr. BLAIR. I suppose I shall be allowed to answer the question.

Mr. HARRISON. I had not yet stated my point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is in order. It is only the understanding of Senators that prevents it, and that is by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLAIR. I propose to say what it is necessary to say in reply to the misapprehension of the Senator from Indiana. This section applies only to those who are disabled, and this language taken in connection with the rest of the section is not open to the criticism of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HARRISON. So do the first sections apply only to the disabled—— ["Question!" "Question!"]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 26, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Bayard,	Coke,	Hampton,	Slater,
Beck,	Colquitt,	Jackson,	Vance,
Blair,	Fair,	Jonas,	Vest,
Brown,	Farley,	Jones of Florida,	Walker,
Butler,	Garland,	Maxey,	Williams.
Call,	George,	Morgan,
Cockrell,	Groome,	Pugh,

NAYS—27.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Palmer,
Bowen,	Frye,	Lapham,	Pike,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	McMillan,	Platt,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Conger,	Hawley,	Miller of N. Y.,	Sherman,
Dawes,	Hill,	Mitchell,	Wilson.
Dolph,	Ingalls,	Morrill,

ABSENT—23.

Aldrich,	Harris,	Mahone,	Sabin,
Anthony,	Hoar,	Miller of Cal.,	Saulsbury,
Camden,	Kenna,	Pendleton,	Sewell,
Cullom,	Lamar,	Plumb,	Van Wyck,
Gibson,	Logan,	Ransom,	Voorhees.
Gorman,	McPherson,	Riddleberger,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. If there be no objection, the question will be taken on the amendments in gross.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In section 6, line 2, I move to strike out after the word "repealed" the words "so far as the same relates to this act or to pensioners under this act;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. That section 4716 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed.

We have now put all the well men on the roll and I do not see why we should not allow the wounded ones to come back. That is all I have to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. What is the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky is to strike out from section 6 all the words therein after the word "repealed," in line 2, the words being, "so far as the same relates to this act or to pensioners under this act."

Mr. CONGER. Let the section be read that it is proposed to repeal entirely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, it will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4716. No money on account of pension shall be paid to any person, or to the widow, children, or heirs of any deceased person, who in any manner voluntarily engaged in or aided or abetted the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll will be called on agreeing to the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. VANCE. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. RANSOM] is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] requested me to state that he is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Bayard,	Fair,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Farley,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Brown,	Garland,	Lamar,	Vance,
Butler,	George,	Maxey,	Van Wyck,
Call,	Groome,	Morgan,	Vest,
Coke,	Hampton,	Pendleton,	Walker,
Colquitt,	Jackson,	Pugh,	Williams.

NAYS—29.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Jones of Nevada,	Pike,
Allison,	Edmunds,	Lapham,	Platt,
Blair,	Frye,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Bowen,	Hale,	Manderson,	Sherman,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harrison,	Miller of Cal.,	Wilson.
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Miller of N. Y.,
Conger,	Hill,	Mitchell,
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Morrill,

ABSENT—19.

Anthony,	Gorman,	McPherson,	Riddleberger,
Camden,	Harris,	Mahone,	Sabin,
Cockrell,	Hoar,	Palmer,	Sewell,
Cullom,	Kenna,	Plumb,	Voorhees.
Gibson,	Logan,	Ransom,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUTLER. In section 1, line 28, after the word "dependency," I move to strike out the words:

Equivalent to some cause prescribed or recognized by the pension laws of the United States as a sufficient reason for the allowance of a pension.

And to insert in lieu thereof—

Whether incurred in the line of duty or not.

So as to make the proviso read:

That every such officer, enlisted man, or widow who is or may become 62 years of age, or who is or may become subject to any disability or dependency, whether incurred in the line of duty or not, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act, &c.

Mr. MITCHELL. I suggest——

Mr. ALLISON. No debate is in order.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that the object of the friends of this amendment is to put the soldiers of the Mexican and Union wars on the same footing in this regard, and this amendment appears to do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is obliged to hold that the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina is not in order. The part of the bill to which his amendment refers has already been agreed to as an amendment. It is not a part of the text of the bill. The amendments made as in Committee of the Whole have been concurred in.

Mr. BUTLER. I withheld my amendment at the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], who told me, as I understood him, that it would be in order to offer it at this time.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from South Carolina misunderstood the Senator from Tennessee. I said to the Senator from South Carolina that if he desired to amend the text of the bill it would not be in order until the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole had been concurred in, but if he desired to amend an amendment made as in Committee of the Whole it must be done then. I suggest to the Senator that he may now move to reconsider the vote by which that particular amendment was concurred in, and his amendment would then become in order, if the Senate should consent to reconsider.

Mr. BUTLER. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina moves to reconsider the vote by which the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole on page 2, beginning with the word "provided," in line 25, to the end of the first section, was concurred in. That will open the amendment, if agreed to, to amendment.

The motion to reconsider was not agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 24, noes 25.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still open to amendment. If no further amendment be proposed the question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to make an inquiry. I endeavored to get the information without making the inquiry publicly. I wish to know authentically from somebody how much this bill is going to add to the annual expenditures of the Government? I made my private inquiry and received estimates varying from $12,000,000 to $50,000,000 from leading men of the Senate, supposed to be familiar with the subject. Will somebody give me a more definite answer?

Mr. JACKSON. We have had that matter under consideration for nearly two months in committee, and have been unable to determine. It may take $10,000,000 or $50,000,000 or $100,000,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then the bill ought to be postponed for a day, until we may have an estimate more satisfactory than that. I suggest that to the gentlemen who have the bill in charge. I know I am making something in the nature of an argument, but I take the responsibility. We must do it. The bill ought not to be put to a vote with this tremendous uncertainty upon it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Perhaps after what has occurred I ought to say that an estimate has been made upon the bill substantially as it stands by the Commissioner of Pensions, and that his estimate for the amendments which have been attached to the Mexican pension bill falls under $12,500,000 annual increase. All the amendments made to the bill in addition to the measure as it came from the House fall below $12,500,000.

Mr. SLATER. I desire to add to what has been said by the chairman of the Pension Committee that the Commissioner of Pensions also says in relation to a large class of cases, those included under the new provisions of the bill, all those who are to be pensioned for disability not incurred in the line of service, but occurring since that service in any form or manner that may happen, so that it is not traceable to their own improper actions, no estimate can be made, and he will make none.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

Mr. MORGAN. Yesterday I made a motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill until the Tuesday after the first Monday in December at 2 o'clock. Finding that I am likely to get one more vote in support of it, I renew that motion. I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until the Tuesday after the first Monday in December at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama moves that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until Tuesday following the first Monday in December next at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GROOME (when Mr. GORMAN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. GORMAN] is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN]. While upon the floor I will also announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). If I were not paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] I should vote "yea."

Mr. SEWELL (when his name was called). I was paired with my colleague [Mr. MCPHERSON], who is temporarily absent. I have transferred that pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 26, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Bayard,	Colquitt,	Jonas,	Slater,
Beck,	Fair,	Jones of Florida,	Vance,
Brown,	Farley,	Maxey,	Vest,
Butler,	Garland,	Morgan,	Walker,
Call,	Groome,	Pendleton,	Williams.
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Pugh,
Coke,	Jackson,	Saulsbury,

NAYS—34.

Aldrich,	Frye,	McMillan,	Platt,
Allison,	George,	Mahone,	Riddleberger,
Blair,	Hale,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Bowen,	Harrison,	Miller of Cal.,	Sewell,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hawley,	Miller of N. Y.,	Sherman,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill,	Mitchell,	Van Wyck,
Conger,	Ingalls,	Morrill,	Wilson.
Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Palmer,
Dolph,	Lapham,	Pike,

ABSENT—16.

Anthony,	Gibson,	Kenna,	Plumb,
Camden,	Gorman,	Lamar,	Ransom,
Cullom,	Harris,	Logan,	Sabin,
Edmunds,	Hoar,	McPherson,	Voorhees.

So the motion to postpone was not agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I offer the following amendment to come in as an additional section:

That from and after the passage of this act all persons on the pension-roll, and all persons hereafter granted a pension, who, while in the military or naval service of the United States and in line of duty, have lost an arm or a leg, shall be entitled to a pension of $40 per month; and those who, in line of duty, have lost a hand or a foot shall be entitled to a pension of $30 per month; and if they have received a wound or wounds or other disability in addition thereto, then $50 per month; and all persons who have a leg amputated at the hip-joint, and all persons who have lost an arm at the shoulder-joint, shall be entitled to $50 per month; and all persons who have lost an arm and a leg shall be entitled to $72 per month.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. HARRIS. I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The result was announced—yeas 3, nays 44; as follows:

YEAS—3.

Cameron of Pa.,	Farley,	Van Wyck.

NAYS—44.

Allison,	Cameron of Wis.,	Frye,	Hill,
Bayard,	Coke,	Garland,	Ingalls,
Beck,	Conger,	Hale,	Jackson,
Blair,	Dawes,	Hampton,	Jonas,
Brown,	Dolph,	Harrison,	Jones of Florida,
Butler	Fair,	Hawley,	Jones of Nevada,
Lapham,	Mitchell,	Pugh,	Vance,
Manderson,	Morrill,	Saulsbury,	Vest,
Maxey,	Palmer,	Sawyer,	Williams,
Miller of N. Y.,	Pendleton,	Sherman,	Walker,
Miller of Cal.,	Pike,	Slater,	Wilson.

ABSENT—29.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Lamar,	Ransom,
Anthony,	George,	Logan,	Riddleberger,
Bowen,	Gibson,	McMillan,	Sabin,
Call,	Gorman,	McPherson,	Sewell,
Camden,	Groome,	Mahone,	Voorhees.
Cockrell,	Harris,	Morgan,
Colquitt,	Hoar,	Platt,
Cullom,	Kenna,	Plumb,

So the amendment was rejected.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. WILLIAMS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. If I were not so paired, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MCMILLAN (when Mr. SABIN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN]. My colleague, if here, would vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ALDRICH (after having voted in the affirmative). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN]. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. JONAS. I announce that my colleague [Mr. GIBSON] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. SEWELL. I announce a pair between the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] in favor of this bill and my colleague [Mr. MCPHERSON] against it.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. CULLOM] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—37.

Allison,	George,	Mahone,	Ransom,

So the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 7380) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1727) to grant letter-carriers at free-delivery offices fifteen days' leave of absence in each year.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 251) providing for printing the annual report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1884, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ALFRED M. SCALES of North Carolina, Mr. W. F. ROGERS of New York, and Mr. A. HERR SMITH of Pennsylvania managers at the conference on the part of the House.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 7380) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the report of the committee of conference upon the bill (H. R. 6656) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes. The action of the House of Representatives on the report of the conferees will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June 24, 1884.

Resolved, That the House concur in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6656) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLUMB. I present the report of the committee of conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6656) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 20, 30, 39, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 60, 61, 62, 63, 69, 70.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 21, 22, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 41, 42, 44, 50, 52, 53, 54, 56, 57, 58, 59, 65, 66, 67, and 68, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$263,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$468,000;" and the Senate agree to the same."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 40, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$25,000;" and the Senate agree to the same."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 43, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$128,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 51, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$337,100;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 55, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment strike out the word "private" and in lieu thereof insert the word "fireman;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 64, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert the following: "That the act entitled 'An act to protect Holmead Cemetery, in the District of Columbia,' approved March 3, 1879, be amended by adding the word 'and convey' after the word 'sell;' so as to make it read, 'sell and convey any part or the whole of said square;'" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 71, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by said amendment insert the following:

"And when special assessments have been reduced on revision as required by law drawback certificates, receivable for all arrears of general taxes due and unpaid June 30, 1882, shall be issued to the holders of outstanding lien certificates for the interest accrued on the amount of such reduction up to the date of the passage of this act."

And the Senate agree to the same.

P. B. PLUMB,
H. L. DAWES,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN F. FOLLETT,
WALDO HUTCHINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. PLUMB. I move the adoption of the report.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to hear that report explained. I confess I do not understand anything about it. From the reading at the desk I can not get any idea of what changes are made in the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator was present when the bill was discussed in the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. I was.

Mr. PLUMB. I can say to him that one of the chief points of disagreement was in regard to the amount to be appropriated for suburban streets, where the amount was increased in the Senate by $10,000, making the total $30,000, and that amount is divided, so as to be $25,000.

The amendment in regard to the opening of streets, about which the Senator had something to say at the time the bill was under consideration in the Senate, is stricken out.

The amount for the improvement of streets which the Senate added, $46,000, is diminished by one-half; that is to say, the amount finally added is one-half the amount added by the Senate.

On the item in regard to the sinking fund for the water-works, inserted by the House and stricken out by the Senate, the Senate recede, leaving the amount as fixed by the House. The amount added to the bill by the Senate for the purpose of improving the grounds around the school-houses is receded from by the Senate.

Those are the special points of disagreement about which the concurrence is as I have stated.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Senator whether there are any new provisions inserted in this bill by the conference committee that were not passed upon by the Senate?

Mr. PLUMB. The only provision that was not passed upon by the Senate that I recall now was an item which the Senate had stricken out in regard to the adjustment of the taxes, the amount to be paid by the District of Columbia and the United States respectively, and an item in regard to the drawback certificates in connection with such issues. The House proposed an amendment to that which was read at the desk and which the Senate has acceded to. With that exception I do not recall any item which was not directly passed upon.

Mr. ALDRICH. The last clause of the report I should like to have read again.

Mr. PLATT. I was about to ask the same thing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The last clause will be read again.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 71, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by said amendment insert the following:

"And when special assessments have been reduced on revision, as required by law, drawback certificates, receivable for all arrears of general taxes due and unpaid June 30, 1882, shall be issued to the holders of outstanding lien certificates for the interest accrued on the amount of such reduction up to the date of the passage of this act."

Mr. ALDRICH. Now, I should like to have amendment numbered 71 reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 12 of section 2, after the word "year," the Senate struck out the following words:

As required by the third section of the act approved June 27, 1879, entitled "An act fixing the rate of interest upon arrearages of general taxes and assessments for special improvements now due to the District of Columbia and for a revision of assessments for special improvements, and for other purposes."

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That said commissioners shall not make requisitions upon the appropriations from the Treasury of the United States for a larger amount during the fiscal year 1885 than they make on the appropriations arising from the revenues of said District, including one-half of all general taxes paid in drawback certificates during said fiscal year.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senate, as I understand this question, struck out of the House bill a proviso in regard to the amount of taxes to be charged by the Treasury officials to the District of Columbia, and the conferees undertook to insert in place of that a proviso that went out in the Senate upon a point of order that it was new legislation upon an appropriation bill, a subject of an entirely different nature, and an amendment which in itself is a very dangerous one, it seems to me, and one involving a very large amount of money. I do not know what the Chair would decide upon a question of order, but it seems to me very singular that an amendment which would not be in order under the rules of the Senate, and was declared not to be in order under the rules of the Senate, can be reported and made in order by a report of a conference committee.

I should like to ask the parliamentary question whether it is in order for a conference committee to insert a provision of general legislation upon an appropriation bill which would not be in order as an amendment in the Senate?

Mr. PLUMB. I will say in regard to that in the first place that I do not think it is the same provision, although I would yield——

Mr. ALDRICH. It is the same in substance and, I think, has the same effect.

Mr. PLUMB. I will not undertake to differ with the Senator on that, though I do not think it is the same in substance. Still the clause was insisted on by the House conferees. I have no particular choice about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think this report had better be printed, together with the last clause that has already been read, so that we shall have a chance to look at it. It is very dangerous to allow a committee of conference to introduce the slightest thing into a conference report that has not been acted on by one or other of the two Houses. It is against the first rule of parliamentary law, the highest rule of parliamentary law, because if the conferees may take the liberty of doing it in any case whatever, I do not care how stringent the circumstances may be, it is a departure from established policy. I remember once when a very distinguished Senator felt himself very much reproved because a conference report was rejected merely on account of some new matter having been introduced. In every case where new matter is introduced it ought to be rejected at once, because if that can be done in any case—I do not speak of the mere phraseology of the amendments between the two Houses—as for instance where the amount is $100,000 in one House and $200,000 in the other, and they make it $100,000.50; but if they introduced new legislation, new items, it seems to me it ought to put an end to the report, or at least it ought to be recommitted. I think, therefore, this report had better be printed and let us look at it in the morning. It may be all right.

Mr. PLUMB. The question as to what is germane and what is within the jurisdiction of a conference committee is a question that is very broad. It is one that arises in every conference. Taking what has been done—I do not say anything about the rules, but taking what has been done—I have not the slightest doubt that this was perfectly within the jurisdiction of the committee of conference, and it was proper for them to insert it if it was proper to be in the bill at all. On that, of course, no one could wish more fully than I to have the instruction of the Senate. It is a question that will be of great importance in reference to what is to occur in the concluding days of this session, because there are numbers of bills now in conference and to go into conference on which legislative provisions have been inserted which will have been amended by the Senate in whole or in part, and which will become the subject of adjustment in conference.

Now, the narrower the rule which the Senate shall establish the less responsibility upon the conferees, and it is a responsibility as far as I am concerned that I shall be willing to have the Senate take rather than accept it myself. Therefore, as I have nothing myself to offer in regard to the point of order, not being posted on such questions, I shall say nothing except simply that I hope the Senate, whatever they may do about this jurisdictional rule, will so act as to lay down a principle governing committees of conference generally upon bills to be considered during this session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio, as the Chair understands, moves that the further consideration of this report be postponed until to-morrow, and that the report be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. That the report be printed, with the disputed clause.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Together with the clause at the end of the bill on which a question has been raised.

Mr. PLUMB. Printing the report will print the last clause with all the other clauses, and inasmuch as this is to go over, let the entire report be printed.

Mr. MORGAN. And the entire bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no; it is hardly worth while to print the whole bill. That might create delay. We have the whole controversy presented in the report.

Mr. PLUMB. I think it will not add considerably to the expense to have the bill reprinted. It is in type yet, I think, and it is in type in such a way that a very slight typographical change will enable the printer to print it in accordance with the report of the conference committee, and I think it would be a very instructive part of the report.

Mr. PLATT. Then the amendments ought to be numbered as they are in the conference report.

Mr. PLUMB. That will be part of the printer's work.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill and Senate amendments and the report of the committee of conference will be printed and the matter will be postponed until to-morrow, all questions of order being reserved. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Amendments were submitted by Mr. SEWELL, Mr. RIDDLEBERGER, Mr. SAWYER, Mr. BOWEN, Mr. BLAIR, Mr. FARLEY, Mr. VANCE, Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. MANDERSON (for Mr. CULLOM), Mr. PIKE, Mr. PLATT, Mr. MAHONE, and Mr. GARLAND, intended to be proposed by them respectively to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on the Library, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MAHONE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. CALL, Mr. VANCE, and Mr. LAPHAM submitted amendments intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. ALDRICH introduced a bill (S. 2341) donating condemned cannon to Tower Post, No. 17, Grand Army of the Republic, Pawtucket, R. I.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives upon the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 251) providing for printing the annual report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1884. The action of the House of Representatives will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June 24, 1884.

Resolved, That the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 251) providing for printing the annual report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1884, and ask a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. ALFRED M. SCALES of North Carolina, Mr. WILLIAM F. ROGERS of New York, and Mr. A. HERR SMITH of Pennsylvania be managers of said conference on the part of the House.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and agree to the conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. GORMAN, and Mr. CONGER were appointed.

RAILROAD IN THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3961) granting to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes. The action of the House of Representatives on the Senate amendments will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June 24, 1884.

Resolved, That the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3961) to grant to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

Ordered, That Mr. OLIN WELLBORN of Texas, Mr. RICE A. PIERCE of Tennessee, and Mr. BISHOP W. PERKINS of Kansas be the managers of the conference on the part of the House.

Mr. COKE. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments to the bill and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes thereon.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore being by unanimous consent authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, Mr. BROWN, Mr. SAWYER, and Mr. HAWLEY were appointed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7069) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

The motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL TERRITORIAL JUDGES.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask the Senator from Iowa to yield to me to have passed a House bill on the Calendar of public importance, to which I think there will be no objection. It is House bill 1682, being Order of Business 630.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator to postpone that for a little time. I will yield to him later, unless there is some special reason why he wants it now.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It will be necessary for me to leave the Senate presently to be in a committee-room.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I yield to the Senator, if it takes no time.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the title be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the pending order be laid aside informally for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1682) providing for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments. The first amendment was, in section 8, line 3, after the word "determine," to strike out "any matter or cause in which the United States is a party and all causes or matters in admiralty" and insert in lieu thereof:

All matters and causes that the court of any district in said Territory now possesses.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add, as a new section:

SEC. 9. That all offenses committed before the passage of this act shall be prosecuted, tried, and determined in the same manner and with the same effect (except as to the number of judges) as if this act had not been passed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, in reference to the Territory of Washington, to report for one more judge there. I send the amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert, after section 8, as new sections, the following:

SEC. 9. That hereafter the supreme court of the Territory of Washington shall consist of a chief-justice and three associate justices, any three of whom shall constitute a quorum, but no justice shall act as a member of the supreme court in any action or proceeding brought to such court by writ of error, bill of exceptions, or appeal from a decision, judgment, or decree rendered by him as judge of a district court.

SEC. 10. That it shall be the duty of the President to appoint one additional associate justice of said supreme court in manner now provided by law, who shall hold his office for the term of four years, and until his successor is appointed and qualified.

SEC. 11. That the said Territory shall be divided into four judicial districts, and a district court shall be held in each district by one of the justices of the supreme court thereof at such time and place as may be prescribed by law. Each judge, after assignment, shall reside in the district to which he is assigned.

SEC. 12. That until changed by the Legislative Assembly of said Territory, the first district of said Territory shall consist of the counties of Walla Walla, Columbia, Garfield, Assotin, Franklin, Adams, Whitman, and Spokane; the second, of the counties of Pierce, Thurston, Mason, Chehalis, Lewis, Pacific, Wahkiakum, Cowlitz, and Clarke; the third, of the counties of King, Kitsap, Jefferson, Clallam, Island, San Juan, Whatcom, Skagit, and Snohomish; and the fourth, of the counties of Skamania, Klikitat, Yakima, Kittitass, Douglas, Lincoln, and Stevens.

SEC. 13. That temporarily, and until otherwise ordered by law, the additional associate justices to be appointed under this act is hereby assigned to said fourth district thereof, and the time and place as now fixed by the statutes of said Territory for holding court therein shall remain until changed by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The numbering of the sections will be corrected to correspond, if there be no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read, "A bill providing for two associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota, one additional justice of the supreme court of the Territory of Washington, and for other purposes."

WILLIAM W. DAY.

Mr. ALLISON. Now let us proceed with the regular order.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask the indulgence of the Senator from Iowa just a moment, and the unanimous consent of the Senate. A House pension bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions unanimously and was placed on the Calendar and reached in its order on the Calendar, when some suggestion was made by the Senator from Kansas as to its phraseology, which he supposed was a little indefinite. I called the attention of the Senator from Kansas to the phraseology, and he has examined it more particularly since then, and I think he will forego any objection on that account. Therefore as there was in the first place a dependent mother, and five years' delay in the Pension Office when a certificate was issued, but before it reached her she had gone to

> The undiscovered country from whose bourn
> No traveler returns.

Mr. ALLISON. If it leads to no discussion, my friend is so amiable that I must yield to him.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I want to save another tragedy. The old gentleman is near going in the same way, and I should like to have this bill passed.

Mr. HALE. Let it go through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the pending order be laid aside informally and that the Senate now consider the bill (H. R. 4188) granting a pension to William W. Day. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I think this bill went over perhaps on the suggestion from me when called up on a previous day, as stated by the Senator from Nebraska. My objection was not in any manner whatever to the bill so far as the beneficiary is concerned, but it appeared to me, and upon reading the bill now it still seems to me, that Mr. Day will obtain arrears of pension not earned by him, not belonging to him, but on account of another claimant whom he could not inherit from, back to the year 1863.

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William W. Day, father of Cornelius V. Day, late a private in Company D, One hundred and fifty-sixth Regiment New York Volunteers.

So far the bill is accurate and of course it ought to pass. Now, what follows:

And that there be paid to him, at the rate of $8 per month, commencing December 12, 1863, the amount allowed Abbie A. Day, mother of the said soldier—

Not the mother of the beneficiary but the mother of the soldier—

under pension certificate No. 198859.

I wish to do no injustice to the claimant, William W. Day, who was the father of Cornelius V. Day, but unless the language of the latter part of this act is ambiguous then Mr. William W. Day will draw a pension at the rate of $8 a month from 1863 for the entire amount allowed to Abbie A. Day, who, I understand, has recently died.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The mother of the deceased soldier. It is merely what was due her.

Mr. ALLISON. I trust the Senator from Nebraska will allow this to pass over now.

Mr. INGALLS. I hope the Senator from Iowa will allow me, because I do not wish to oppose the passage of the bill, to call the attention of the committee to see whether it ought not to be amended.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, let these two Senators arrange that, and call up the bill to-morrow.

Mr. INGALLS. I withdraw all objection to the bill. I will not stand in the way of the passage of the bill.

Mr. BECK. Is this proceeding by unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Proceeding by unanimous consent, subject to a call for the regular order.

Mr BECK. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is called for. The appropriation bill is before the Senate.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO RAILWAY.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask unanimous consent to take up Order of Business 745, and I will promise the Senate in advance that what I state shall be strictly adhered to, there shall be no discussion. If there is a bare suggestion of it I will withdraw the motion. It is a bill to allow the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad Company to extend its lines up to Old Point Comfort, a bill that has passed the House, has the unanimous recommendation of the Military Committee of the Senate, and I simply ask the time in which the Chair can put the motion on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the pending order be informally laid aside, and that the Senate now consider Order of Business 745, being the bill (H. R. 4977) to authorize the extension of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company to a point on the military lands at Fortress Monroe, Virginia.

Mr. INGALLS. I think that is unjust to the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. INGALLS. If there is anything to be done I think the bill of the Senator from Nebraska——

Mr. ALLISON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, allow me to withdraw the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The appropriation bill is before the Senate.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7069) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the first reading of the appropriation bill be dispensed with, and the bill be read by paragraphs for amendment, and the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations be considered as they are reached in the reading of the bill; and I would call the attention of Senators to report No. 760, which contains a detailed statement of the amendments and recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that this bill be read by paragraphs and sections for amendment and that the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations be considered as they are reached. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Senate," in line 15, to increase the appropriation "for compensation of the officers, clerks, messengers, and others receiving an annual salary in the service of the Senate" from $258,742.10 to $266,884.60.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, in the clause making appropriations for the office of "keeper of stationery," before the word "laborers," in line 36, to strike out "three" and insert "four," so as to read:

Four laborers, at $720 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for clerks to committees, in line 64, after "public lands," to insert: "clerk to the Committee on Indian Affairs."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 76, to increase the appropriation for the compensation of the "telegraph operator" from $900 to $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 81, after the word "dollars," to strike out "acting assistant doorkeeper" and insert "assistant sergeant-at-arms;" so as to read

Assistant sergeant-at-arms, $2,592.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 84, to insert:

For one upholsterer and locksmith, $1,440.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to inquire whether by changing the title or function of the acting assistant doorkeeper to assistant sergeant-at-arms we change the method of appointment in any way? Does a resolution of the Senate authorize the Sergeant-at-Arms to appoint an assistant?

Mr. ALLISON. I have not examined that particular question.

Mr. MORGAN. I have doubt as to whether the existing resolution of the Senate authorizes the Sergeant-at-Arms to appoint an assistant sergeant-at-arms. I call attention to it now.

Mr. ALLISON. I will have that question looked into.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to insert lines 85 and 86.

The amendment was agreed to.

For superintendent of the document-room (Amzi Smith), $2,400.

Mr. INGALLS. I notice that the name of the present incumbent of the position of superintendent of the document-room is inserted as an amendment after "room," in line 93. I assume that the object and purposes of the amendment are to secure the retention of that efficient and accomplished servant of the Senate in the place which he has so long occupied to the entire satisfaction I believe of all who have had occasion to know his services. But I would suggest whether it is not an innovation that may possibly have serious and perhaps complicated results hereafter. Suppose for instance that during the recess of the Senate some disqualifying accident should occur to the gentleman named, so that he should become incompetent to discharge the duties of the office; suppose that death should overtake him; would not the fact that the payment of this salary is to be made to this gentleman by name prevent the substitution of an officer in such way as to carry on the duties of that place and to complete the service of the Senate?

The Senator from Iowa will, of course, appreciate the fact that I make this allusion with entire kindness to the incumbent of the office; but this is an innovation; it is one that it seems to me is a very dangerous one. I should regret to see the Senate enter upon a course of legislation that would assume, without protest, that it was wise or sagacious policy to place in these various subordinate positions, for which we hold one officer responsible, men by name who are beyond the reach of discipline and for whom substitution can not be made.

I assume that the Committee on Appropriations had some information that has not yet been communicated to the Senate why it is advisable to take this course, and I do not rise to object to the amendment but to say in this public manner on the first occasion that it is offered without any intimation of dissatisfaction with the officer named, and I am glad that it occurs with regard to an officer about whom no suspicion or surmise of discontent can even be assumed to exist, that I think the policy is a mistaken one, and I regret that it has been initiated.

Mr. ALLISON. This is not a usual provision, although there are quite a number in this bill, and in two or three instances before two or three names have been inserted in this way in appropriation bills. There was some apprehension, I think. I ought to say frankly to the Senate that Mr. Amzi Smith might be removed, and it was believed to be the wish and purpose of the Senate to retain him as long as he was able to discharge his duties.

I appreciate of course the criticism made by the Senator from Kansas that in case of the death of Mr. Smith during the vacation of the Senate there would not be a head of the document-room drawing a full salary. Of course the senior assistant, whoever he may be, would at once be in charge of that room, as Mr. Smith has two assistants.

Mr. BECK. I will add to what the Senator from Iowa has said that I had another reason for voting for this amendment in committee. I was not willing to increase the salary of the superintendent of the document-room and make it an exception so as to have an increase for all time to come. Even if Mr. Amzi Smith should die or anything should happen to him, he is such an exceptional officer that I desired to show that we were not making any general increase of the salary of that office, but that that man's services were so special, that without making an increase in the pay of the office for all time to come we could afford to give him an addition without making it a precedent that officer should always hereafter, no matter who filled the place, draw that pay. I do not think we have given him quite enough for his services. I would give him much more if I had my way.

Mr. INGALLS. I agree with the Senator from Kentucky. I do not think the value of the services of this official is properly appreciated. To any person familiar with the vast archives of this body, with the enormous amount of printed matter, extending back for more than half a century, with which some official must be absolutely familiar, so that if at any time we require a document ancient, forgotten, for the purpose of illustrating an argument or showing what has been done upon a subject now before the Senate in days gone by—I say the value of the services of a man who is familiar with that vast accumulation of material can not be overestimated, and I should be very glad indeed to see the compensation of the superintendent of the document-room raised to what would be a fair equivalent for the great service he is constantly able to render to this body.

I believe that the intimations which have been made in this debate would be sufficient to protect the incumbent in the enjoyment of that office. I think that I express the universal opinion of this body when I say that the incumbent is so supereminently qualified that it would be hazardous and dangerous to remove him. Therefore that obstacle which the Senator from Iowa has pointed out I believe is fanciful, and I still suggest the difficulty that arises if we are to go on in different appropriation bills placing different officers here in positions from which they can not be removed by the principal officer who is responsible to us for the administration of the service of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Kanses allow me to ask him if he thinks the salary of that particular office, independent of the present incumbent, ought to be increased to this or a larger amount?

Mr. INGALLS. I do.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not agree with the Senator in that.

Mr. INGALLS. I think any man competent to administer that office, any man who is able to accumulate the information about the documents and records and messages and papers that are on file in this Capitol, is worth more than the maximum named in this bill or the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me to put my question in a little different form, as perhaps he did not gather the exact idea on my mind? No Senator who has been here two years is ignorant of the fact of the exceptional efficiency of the particular incumbent of that office at this time; and while I would very willingly vote $2,400 or $3,400 or $4,400 as a salary to that officer because of his superior efficiency, I would not be willing to fix at such a rate the regular salary of this office if we are to get a new man less efficient than he and therefore less valuable. I am not willing to take the chances upon it and fix the salary. If I am not right in that, there is no other method by which we can compensate according to the actual value of exceptional services, such as we are receiving in that office to-day, except to name the man, and I am therefore in favor of the amendment as it stands.

Mr. INGALLS. There is force in what the Senator from Tennessee so forcibly says, but there are also other officers in that room who are entitled to the same meed of praise. There is one modest and unobtrusive man who has been familiar with the affairs of that room since 1861, whose salary is increased by this bill from $1,400 to $1,600; and I say to the Senator from Tennessee that in my judgment the only proper way to administer that office is to keep a force of men there continually in training, to retain them there by sufficient salaries, not extravagant but satisfactory, so that they shall be here consecutively one after the other as long as the office is to be administered. The best-trained man, the best scholar, the most competent man might be put into that room without previous experience, and he would be as helpless and worthless as a ten-year old child. The only thing we can properly do here is to not only keep the superintendent there so long as he can be retained, but to place with him a corps of assistants who shall also be amply remunerated and shall be retained there so long as their services are valuable.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator from Tennessee will turn to the ninety-eighth page, line 2390, he will see a method by which he may carry out the suggestions which he has made very properly in reference to the increase of salary while the present incumbent holds the office.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator give me the page and line again?

And while the office is held by the present incumbent $500 additional.

That has been in the bill for several years. I do not myself see the force of the objection made by the Senator from Kansas to the naming of this person in the bill. If anything should happen to him by which he should vacate the office, if he should die or be unable to perform the duties, there would be a vacancy, which would be filled by appointment precisely as in any other case, and the salary would go to the incumbent.

Mr. INGALLS. Now I should like the Senator to pause there a moment and answer me, if he pleases, this: This item of appropriation being payable to Amzi Smith, in case Amzi Smith should die could it be paid to anybody else?

Mr. DAWES. I have no doubt that the fair meaning is to Amzi Smith while he holds that office.

Mr. INGALLS. But the Senator from Iowa says his apprehensions are that he is going to be removed and the intention is to keep him there.

Mr. DAWES. I do not think he could be removed by any officer of the Senate under this clause; but I do not doubt that he could be removed by some other power.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to be misunderstood with reference to this officer. I did not say that I had an apprehension he would be removed, because on consultation with the Sergeant-at-Arms, who has the authority over this officer, he stated to me distinctly that it was not his purpose to remove him, but, on the contrary, that he intended to allow him to remain as long as he performed the duties.

Mr. DAWES. That was his statement to the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. That was his statement to the committee.

Mr. DAWES. While I have no doubt this fixes him in the office so long, as he desires to stay there during this year, if he desires to stay during the year and is able to stay, yet if he should die or if he should resign the office would be vacant, and the salary would go to the succeeding officer when the office was filled in the ordinary way. I do not see any objection except to this method of designating officers, and there is some force in that objection, but it is resorted to in regard to the other branch quite frequently in this bill, and it has been resorted to on several occasions before as to other officers. It seems to me it is a harmless provision and of great value in this instance.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I am not particularly anxious about the form which this item of appropriation shall take in this bill, but I think the salary ought to be larger than has been reported, and I trust that the committee will raise no point of order, if one can be raised, on a motion to make the salary of the superintendent of the document-room a little larger. The Chief Clerk of the Senate receives $3,000; the financial clerk receives $3,000; the minute and journal clerk, $2,592; the principal executive clerk and the principal clerk, each $2,592; also the enrolling clerk, and also the assistant doorkeeper and acting assistant doorkeeper, each $2,592. Now, it seems to me that the duties of that office, whether performed by Mr. Smith or anybody else, are certainly equivalent to the duties of the officers of the Senate who are receiving $2,592, and I move to amend by striking out the words "four hundred," and inserting in lieu thereof "five hundred and ninety-two;" so that it will read "$2,592." I think that that would place the superintendent of the document-room on an equality with other officers of the Senate as to pay.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILSON in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALLISON. The committee considered this very carefully, and thought the salary proposed was ample. Therefore I trust the amendment will not be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment as amended.

Mr. INGALLS. I observe in glancing hastily over the bill that, as the Senator from Iowa advised me, there has been considerable of this kind of legislation inserted. I find on page 9:

And for the Journal Clerk (H. H. Smith).

Therefore Mr. H. H. Smith is placed in his position as an immovable functionary.

Mr. ALLISON. That is in the House.

Mr. INGALLS. Then, on page 12, "second assistant doorkeeper (George A. Bacon)," and on the next page "for one employé (John T. Chancey)," "one department messenger (C. W. Combs);" and then on page 15 comes "one chief Official Reporter (John J. McElhone)." I do not understand why if the House of Representatives are to enthrone their chief official reporter and place him beyond the reach of fate, the accomplished and efficient Official Reporter of this body should not be similarly located. It would be very gratifying to me.

Then in some of the other Departments, notably in the Post-Office Department, on page 98, it appears that Miss or Mrs. Jennie M. Hunt had so endeared herself to that Department or had become so indispensable to the Postmaster-General or some one of his assistants that she was placed in by name at a compensation of $1,000. But as that was along toward the close of the bill, the Committee on Appropriations evidently thought that these innovations were becoming thickly sown through it, and therefore they struck that out and made an invidious distinction against a woman, I believe the only one who is placed in position by name in the bill.

If this is to proceed, if in successive appropriation bills the favorites of departments and of bureaus are to be selected by name and placed in appropriation bills beyond the reach of anything except Congress, it appears to me that eventually we shall get our public service into rather a serious fix. I think it would be well to begin now and place our protest on this sort of legislation. I see the Senator from Pennsylvania is very solicitous to make some motion.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am.

Mr. INGALLS. I will yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 24, 1884.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday, when,

On motion of Mr. WELLBORN, by unanimous consent, the reading of that portion of the Journal relating to the formal introduction and reference of bills and joint resolutions was omitted.

The remainder of the Journal was read and approved.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FORNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6861) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on said bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. FORNEY, Mr. TOWNSHEND, and Mr. KEIFER managers on the part of the House at said conference.

BUREAU OF LABOR STATISTICS.

Mr. FORAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of submitting a conference report.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1340) to establish and maintain a bureau of labor statistics, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In line 12 of said amendment, after the word "Interior," insert the words "upon the recommendation of said commissioner;" and the Senate agree to the same.

M. A. FORAN,
J. J. O'NEILL,
B. R. JAMES,
Managers on the part of the House.
NELSON W. ALDRICH,
HENRY W. BLAIR,
THOMAS F. BAYARD.
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The rules of the House require a written report to accompany each conference report, explaining the effect of the changes in the bill.

Mr. KEIFER. I think that might be dispensed with in this case, the gentleman himself stating the effect of the changes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection that course will be pursued.

There was no objection.

Mr. FORAN. The only statement to be submitted in connection with the report is what is shown by the report itself, that the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate with the change suggested by the House conferees; that is, that the commissoner of this bureau shall have the power to recommend the appointment of the chief clerk and other clerical force. That is, that these appointments be made upon the recommendation of the commissioner. This was the point made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS], the author of the bill, who was present when the conference met, and it was agreed to by the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. FORAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTESTED-ELECTION—CHALMERS VS. MANNING.

Mr. COOK. I rise to a question of the highest privilege. I desire to call up the contested-election case of Chalmers vs. Manning.

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri. I wish now, Mr. Speaker, to submit the views of the minority in that case.

I hope the motion of the gentleman from Iowa will not be insisted upon until the views of the minority have been printed.

Mr. COOK. I thought they had been submitted some days ago.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the views of the minority of the committee will be now received and ordered to be printed to accompany the report of the committee.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa now calls up the contested-election case of Chalmers vs. Manning, which is a motion of the highest privilege, for present consideration.

Mr. COOK. At the solicitation of gentlemen around me I have no objection to yielding for a moment to permit the introduction of measures that will not lead to debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not yield conditionally or select certain gentlemen to whom he will yield.

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri. I raise the question of consideration at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there are several matters of quasi-privilege upon the Speaker's table, which should be disposed of as soon as possible.

Mr. COOK. I withdraw the demand for a few moments.

VENTILATION OF THE HALL.

Mr. HARDY. I rise to make a privileged report. The Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics, charged with the duty of inquiring into the present method of heating, lighting, and ventilating the Hall of the House of Representatives, report that they have given the subject a careful investigation and have heard the views and opinions of experienced and competent scientists in regard thereto and have caused experiments to be made as to the character and quality of the air of the House. The committee herewith submit the arguments and statements made before the committee and the results of experiments made under their direction. I move that the report be printed and recommitted.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURN. I ask unanimous consent to take a Senate bill from the Speaker's table for the purpose of moving that the House insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. MILLS. It occurs to me the gentleman from Minnesota has been recognized two or three times to ask unanimous consent, while others of us have been seeking recognition and failed to obtain it.

The SPEAKER. Several gentlemen desire to call up matters on the Speaker's table, including House bills with Senate amendments, in which they desire to move concurrence or non-concurrence. The Chair will state that the Committee on Enrolled Bills after awhile will be very much crowded with work, especially when the appropriation bills come to be enrolled. It is important that these bills on the Speaker's table should be disposed of so that they may go to the Committee on Enrolled Bills as soon as possible.

Mr. HAMMOND. There are from twelve to fifteen bills with Senate amendments on the Speaker's table. If in order, I would like to move that the House proceed to their consideration now, my object being that the clerical work may be expedited.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order till after the morning hour.

Mr. HAMMOND. I will make the motion after the morning hour.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that he ask unanimous consent to do it now.

Mr. HAMMOND. It is suggested that I move to dispense with the morning hour. I make that motion.

The morning hour was dispensed with (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

Mr. HAMMOND. I now move that the House proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table, in order to take up House bills with Senate amendments for the purpose of concurring or non-concurring in the amendments.

Mr. COX, of New York. Is it possible to go to the Speaker's table without taking up the bills in their order?

The SPEAKER. The House bills with Senate amendments are the first that would be reached.

Mr. COX, of New York. Can the gentleman move to go to the Speaker's table for the purpose of taking up those bills?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can move that the House shall proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table; and the House can cease to consider business on the Speaker's table whenever it desires to do so. The motion of the gentleman from Georgia is, that the House now proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. HAMMOND. Perhaps it would be better, instead of submitting it in the form of a motion, to ask unanimous consent to go to the Speaker's table for the limited purpose indicated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table, for the purpose of disposing of bills that have passed the two Houses with amendments. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SARAH A. REDMOND.

The first House bill on the Speaker's table, with amendments of the Senate, was the bill (H. R. 2346) for the relief of Sarah A. Redmond.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

In line 11, after the word "bond," strike out "double the amount as security for the issue of said certificate," and insert "with two sufficient sureties, in double the amount as security in the issue of said certificate, and as an indemnity to said District against all cost, loss, or damage in consequence of the issue of said duplicate certificate. And;" so as to make the bill read:

"That the auditor of the District of Columbia be, and is hereby, authorized to issue to Sarah A. Redmond a duplicate certificate for one lost or burned, numbered 18313, class 6, of the board of audit, for $30.94: Provided, That she furnish to the auditor satisfactory proof of the loss or destruction of the original certificate, and that the same has not been paid, and executes to the commissioners of the District of Columbia a bond, with two sufficient sureties, in double the amount, as security in the issue of said certificate, and as an indemnity to said District against all cost, loss, or damage in consequence of the issue of said duplicate certificate. And said certificate shall be redeemed, as all board of audit certificates are, by the Treasurer of the United States, as commissioner of the sinking fund of the District of Columbia."

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. It appears to me that this is merely a clerical amendment. I move to concur.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

SAINT LUKE'S PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. 4652) for the relief of Saint Luke's Protestant Episcopal church, with an amendment by the Senate.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: That all taxes, together with the interest and penalties, now due and unpaid, for the years 1876, 1877, 1878, 1879, and 1880, upon lots 38, 39, and 40, in square 194, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, now occupied by the stone church known as Saint Luke's Protestant Episcopal church, be, and the same are hereby, remitted.

Mr. BAGLEY. I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

MILES B. FARLIN.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. 1076) granting a pension to Miles B. Farlin, with an amendment by the Senate.

The amendment was read, as follows:

At the end of the bill insert: "And pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act."

Mr. BAGLEY. I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

JUDITH LAUTER.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. 2400) for the relief of Judith Lauter, with a Senate amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 6, before "dollars," strike out "sixteen" and insert "twelve;" so as to make the bill read:

"Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to direct the payment to Judith Lauter, widow of Anton Lauter, late a private in Company E, First Regiment New York Cavalry, of a pension of $12 per month, in lieu of the pension of $8 per month which she now receives."

Mr. BAGLEY. I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

LOUISA V. DE KILPATRICK.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. 4707) granting a pension to Louisa V. de Kilpatrick, widow of Maj. Gen. Judson Kilpatrick, with a Senate amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 6, after the word "her," strike out "the pension of the widow of a brigadier-general of the United States Army" and insert "a pension at the rate of $50 per month;" so as to make the bill read:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Louisa V. de Kilpatrick, widow of Maj. Gen. Judson Kilpatrick, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month."

Mr. PHELPS. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

ISABELLA I. RAMSDELL.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. 4981) granting a pension to Isabella I. Ramsdell, with an amendment by the Senate.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 4 strike out "Isabella I. Ramsdell" and insert "Isabella J. Ramsdell;" in line 5, after the word "from," strike out "September 24, 1877," and insert "the passage of this act;" so as to read:

"Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, at the rate of $8 per month, to date from the passage of this act, the name of Isabella J. Ramsdell, on account of the death of her husband, David D. Ramsdell, a sailor and marine of the United States service for over thirty years, who died of disease superinduced by said service."

Amend the title so as to read: A bill granting a pension to Isabella J. Ramsdell.

Mr. JAMES. I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

HENRY NEWMAN.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. 4678) to remove the political disabilities of Henry Newman, returned from the Senate with amendments.

The amendments of the Senate were, in line 1, to strike out the word "political;" in lines 2 and 3, to strike out the words "the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "section 1218 of the Revised Statutes;" in lines 5 and 6, to strike out the words "and those imposed by section 1218 of the Revised Statutes;" so that the bill will read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. (two-thirds of the House concurring therein), That the disabilities imposed by section 1218 of the Revised Statutes upon Henry Newman, now a private in Battery B, Second United States Artillery, in the Army of the United States, be, and the same are hereby, removed.

Also amend the title so as to read: "An act to remove certain disabilities of Henry Newman."

Mr. TUCKER. I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

ROBERT D. THURBORN.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. 5458) to remove the disabilities of Robert D. Thurborn, of Virginia, returned from the Senate with amendments.

The amendments of the Senate were to change the name "Thurborn" to "Thorburn" in the bill and the title.

Mr. TUCKER. I move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS ALLOWED IN TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. 5377) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department, returned from the Senate with amendments.

The amendments were to insert on page 71, after line 25, the following:

Mississippi:

To Julia A. Nutt, widow and executrix of Haller Nutt, deceased, of Adams County, the sum of $85,556.17.

Amend the title by adding the words "and for other purposes."

Mr. ROWELL and Mr. GEDDES moved to non-concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN. Would it not be better to refer the bill and amendments?

Mr. GEDDES. Am I at liberty to move to refer the bill and amendments to the Committee on War Claims?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can make that motion.

Mr. ROWELL. The subject-matter of this amendment has been before the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. GEDDES. Only in a general way. I move to refer the bill with the Senate amendments to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GEDDES subsequently said: I move that the Committee on War Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5377) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department. My object is that the House shall non-concur in the amendments of the Senate and ask a conference.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the Committee on War Claims will be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, the amendments of the Senate will be non-concurred in, and a conference with the Senate requested.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. GEDDES, Mr. STORM, and Mr. ROWELL as the conferees on the part of the House.

REPORTS OF THE BUREAU OF ETHNOLOGY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the joint resolution (H. Res. 137) for printing the annual report of the Bureau of Ethnology, returned from the Senate with amendments.

The amendments of the Senate were as follows:

In line 2, after the word "thousand," insert "five hundred;" in line 2, after the word "the" where it first occurs, insert "4th and 5th;" in line 4, strike out all after the word "illustrations" down to and including "1883;" in line 7, strike out "two thousand" and insert "three thousand five hundred;" and in line 7, strike out "eight thousand" and insert "seven thousand;" so that the joint resolution will read as follows:

Resolved, &c., That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 15,500 copies each of the fourth and fifth annual reports of the Director of the Bureau of Ethnology, with accompanying papers and illustrations, and uniform with the preceding volumes of the series; of which 3,500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 7,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 for distribution by the Bureau of Ethnology.

Mr. KEIFER. I move to concur in the amendments of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the joint resolution (H. Res. 138) for printing annual reports of the United States Geological Survey, returned from the Senate with amendments.

The amendments of the Senate were as follows:

In line 2, after the word "thousand," insert "five hundred;" in line 3, before the word "annual," insert "fourth and fifth;" in line 4 strike out the words "beginning with the fourth and;" in line 5 strike out "2,000" and insert "3,500," and in line 6 strike out "8,000" and insert "7,000;" so that the joint resolution will read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That there be printed at the Government Printing Office, in addition to the number already ordered by law, 15,500 copies of each of the fourth and fifth annual reports of the Director of the United States Geological Survey, uniform with the preceding volumes of the series; of which 3,500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 7,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 for distribution by the Geological Survey.

Mr. SCALES. I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF LAND COMMISSIONER.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the joint resolution (H. Res. 264) to amend a resolution approved August 7, 1882, providing for the publication of report of Public Land Commissioner, returned from the Senate with amendments.

The amendments of the Senate were as follows:

After the word "Interior," strike out "&c.," and insert "as provided in said act;" and add to the joint resolution the following:

And also that the regulation for the distribution of the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion in the act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, be amended by striking out the words "until July 1, 1884," and substituting therefor "until the expiration of their respective terms of Congressional service."

So that the joint resolution will read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That joint resolution providing for the printing of additional copies of Codified Land Laws and History of the Public Domain of the United States, approved August 7, 1882, be amended by the substitution of the word "three" in the place of "two" in the proviso of said resolution; so that it shall read: "That all copies not ordered to be distributed within three years after the passage of this act shall be sold by the Secretary of the Interior," as provided in said act. And, also, that the regulation for the distribution of the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion in the act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, be amended by striking out the words "until July 1, 1884," and substituting therefor "until the expiration of their respective terms of Congressional service."

Also amend the title by adding the words "and for other purposes."

Mr. SCALES. I move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT FOR 1884.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the joint resolution (H. Res. 251) providing for printing the annual report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1884, returned from the Senate with amendments.

The amendments of the Senate were as follows: In line 1 strike out "400,000" and insert "325,000;" in line 2 strike out the word "Commissioners" and insert "Commissioner;" in lines 4 and 5 strike out "314,000" and insert "220,000;" in line 6 strike out "56,000" and insert "85,000;" and in line 8 strike out "30,000" and insert "20,000;" so that the joint resolution will read as follows:

Resolved, &c., That there be printed 325,000 copies of the annual report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1884; 220,000 copies for use of members of the House of Representatives, 85,000 copies for use of members of the Senate, and 20,000 copies for the use of the Department of Agriculture.

Also add to the joint resolution the following:

SEC. 2. That the sum of $162,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to defray the cost of the publication of said report.

Mr. SCALES. I move to non-concur in the Senate amendments and ask a committee of conference.

Mr. KEIFER. Before that vote is taken we would like to hear some reason for non-concurrence.

Mr. SCALES. The reason is this: As the joint resolution passed the House it provided for publishing 400,000 copies of the Agricultural Report, of which 220,000 were for the use of the members of the House and 56,000 for the members of the Senate. The Senate by its amendments has reduced the number to be printed by 75,000 copies, and at the same time reduced the number for members of the House to 220,000 and increased the number for members of the Senate to 85,000. I therefore move non-concurrence and ask for a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER subsequently announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. SCALES, Mr. ROGERS of New York, and Mr. SMITH.

GULF, COLORADO AND SANTE FÉ RAILWAY COMPANY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3961) to grant to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

On page 1, after the word "Kansas," in line 14, insert "the line to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior before work is begun."

On page 1, strike out the word "branches," in line 15.

On page 2, after the word "for," in line 3, insert "such."

On page 2, after the word "stations," in line 3, insert "as may be established; but such grant shall be allowed but once."

On page 2, strike out all after the word "further," in line 13, down to and including line 18, and insert:

"That no part of the lands herein granted shall be used except in such manner and for such purposes only as shall be necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said railroad, telegraph, and telephone line; and when any portion thereof shall cease to be so used, such portion shall revert to the nation or tribe of Indians from which the same shall have been taken."

On page 3, strike out all after the word "referees," in line 2, down to and including the word "company," in line 6, and insert "to be appointed by the President."

On page 6, strike out all after the word "lands," in line 18, down to and including line 20.

On page 8, strike out section 7 and insert in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 7. The officers, servants, and employés of said company necessary to the construction and management of said road and telegraph and telephone lines shall be allowed to reside, while so engaged, upon said right of way, but subject to the provisions of the Indian intercourse laws and such rules and regulations as may be established by the Secretary of the Interior."

On page 9, at the end of section 9, insert:

"That said railroad company shall construct and maintain continually all road and highway crossings and necessary bridges over said railway wherever said roads and highways do now or may hereafter cross said railway's right of way or may be by the proper authorities laid out across the same."

Mr. WELLBORN. I move that the House non-concur in these amendments and ask a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER subsequently announced the appointment of Mr. WELLBORN, Mr. PIERCE, and Mr. PERKINS as the conferees on the part of the House.

OATHS BEFORE CONGRESSIONAL SUBCOMMITTEES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4411) to amend section 101 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to allow the chairman of a subcommittee of a committee of either House of Congress to administer oaths.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"Any member of either House of Congress may administer oaths to witnesses in any matter depending in either House of Congress of which he is a member, or any committee thereof."

Amend the title of the bill so as to read: "An act to provide for the administration of oaths to witnesses in matters depending in either House of Congress."

Mr. HAMMOND. I move that the House concur in the amendments just read.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. 6094) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. This bill has been returned from the Senate with a message, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Senate insists on its amendments to House bill 6094, making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and asks a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. LOGAN, Mr. DAWES, and Mr. CALL be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURN. I move that the House insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. HANCOCK, Mr. FOLLETT, and Mr. WASHBURN as the conferees on the part of the House.

BRIDGES ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI AT SAINT PAUL.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. 2243) to authorize foot and carriage or railroad bridges across the Mississippi River at Saint Paul, in the State of Minnesota.

The message of the Senate accompanying the bill was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2243) to authorize foot and carriage or railroad bridges across the Mississippi River at Saint Paul, in the State of Minnesota, and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Ordered, That Mr. MCMILLAN, Mr. CONGER, and Mr. VEST be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURN. I move that the House insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. WASHBURN, Mr. WELLER, and Mr. PETERS as the conferees on the part of the House.

SMITHSONIAN REPORT.

Mr. SCALES, from the Committee on Printing, reported back the following concurrent resolution of the Senate with the recommendation that it do pass.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House concurring therein), That the annual report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1883 be printed; and that there be printed 16,060 extra copies, of which 3,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 6,060 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 7,000 copies for the use of the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. SCALES. I desire to say one word. This is the same number recommended heretofore. The Senate increased what was recommended by the House 500 copies. It was so late in the session we concluded to allow them to have them, and they have taken every copy themselves.

The resolution was concurred in.

Mr. SCALES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMMEDIATE TRANSPORTATION OF DUTIABLE GOODS.

Mr. MILLS. I move by unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar for immediate consideration the bill (H. R. 6215) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880.

The bill was read, as follows:

That sections 5 and 6 of the act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880, be, and the same are hereby, amended so that they shall read as follows, namely:

"SEC. 5. That merchandise transported under the provisions of this act shall be conveyed in cars, vessels, or vehicles securely fastened with locks or seals, under the exclusive control of the officers of the customs; and merchandise may also be transported under the provisions of this act by express companies on passenger trains, in safes and trunks, which shall be of such size, character, and description, and secured in such manner as shall be from time to time prescribed by the Secretary; and in cases where merchandise shall be imported in boxes or packages too large to be included within the safes or trunks so prescribed, such merchandise may be transported under the provisions of this act by such express companies in a separate compartment of the car, secured in such manner as shall from time to time be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and merchandise such as pig-iron, spiegel-iron, scrap-iron, iron ore, railroad-iron, and similar articles, commonly transported upon platform or flat cars, may be transported under the provisions of this act upon such platform or flat cars; and the weight of such merchandise so transported shall be ascertained in all cases before shipment, and ordinary railroad scales may be used for such purpose; and inspectors shall be stationed at proper points along the designated routes, or upon any car, vessel, vehicle, or train, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and at the expense of the companies, respectively. Such merchandise shall not be unladen or transshipped between the ports of first arrival and final destination unless authorized by the regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury in cases which may arise from a difference in the gauge of railroads, or where the route is bonded for both land and water carriage, or from accidents, or from legal intervention, or when by reason of the length of the route the cars, after due inspection by customs officers, shall be considered unsafe or unsuitable to proceed further, or from low water, ice, or other unavoidable obstruction to navigation; and in no case shall there be permitted any breaking of the original packages of such merchandise.

"SEC. 6. That merchandise so destined for immediate transportation shall be transferred, under proper supervision, directly from the importing vessel to the car, vessel, or vehicle specified in the entry provided for in section 2 of this act."

The report was read, as follows.

Mr. MILLS, from the Committee on Ways and Means, submitted the following report:

The act of June 10, 1880, to amend the statutes in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, provides that merchandise consigned to and delivered for either of the ports specified in the seventh section of said act should be shipped immediately through the port of first arrival to the port of destination. The act further provides that—

"Such merchandise shall not be unladen or transshipped between the ports of first arrival and final destination unless authorized by the regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury in cases which may arise from a difference in the gauge of railroads, or from accidents or from legal intervention, or where, by reason of the length of the route, the cars, after due inspection by customs officers, shall be considered unsafe or unsuitable to proceed further, or from low water, ice, or other unavoidable obstruction to navigation, and in no case shall there be any breaking of the original packages of such merchandise."

The object of the bill is to provide for the transshipment of said merchandise where the route to be traveled is partly by water and partly by land, and the only amendments are to substitute the words "or where the route is bonded for both land and water carriage," in the fifth section of the law of June 10, 1880, and strike out of the sixth section the words "in which the same is to be transported to its final destination," and substitute therefor the words "specified in the entry provided for in section 2 of this act." The change proposed is rendered necessary to the immediate transportation of goods over routes that require land and water carriage. Without this change goods can not be carried over such routes. The committee think the bill ought to be passed, and report the same back and recommend its passage.

There was no objection, and the House Calendar was discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MILLS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO LETTER-CARRIERS.

Mr. COOK obtained the floor.

Mr. COX, of New York. I appeal to the gentleman from Iowa to yield to me in order that I may call up from the Speaker's table for action at this time the bill (S. 1727) to grant letter-carriers at free-delivery offices fifteen days' leave of absence in each year.

Mr. GLASCOCK. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield for that purpose?

Mr. WILLIS. I hope he will, and that the bill will pass at once.

Mr. COOK. I yield for that purpose.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all letter-carriers at free-delivery offices shall be entitled to leave of absence not to exceed fifteen days in each year, without loss of pay; and the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to employ, when necessary, during the time such leave of absence is granted, such number of substitute letter-carriers as may be deemed advisable, who shall be paid for services rendered at the rate of $600 per annum.

Mr. COSGROVE. I object.

Mr. WILLIS. It is the only class which is excepted, and I hope the gentleman from Missouri will withdraw his objection.

Mr. COX, of New York. All the clerks in the Departments have leave of absence, and there is no just reason why it should be refused to these letter-carriers.

Mr. CHACE. I join in asking the gentleman from Missouri to withdraw his objection so the bill may be considered and acted on at this time.

Mr. COSGROVE. I decline to withdraw my objection.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not think there will be any objection to the bill when it is once understood.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri declines to withdraw his objection.

Mr. COSGROVE. I will withdraw my objection, Mr. Speaker, under a promise that there will be a yea-and-nay vote on the passage of the bill.

Mr. COOK. All right, I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. COSGROVE. I ask for the reading of the minority report on that bill.

The SPEAKER. This is a Senate bill.

Mr. COSGROVE. The understanding when I withdrew my objection was that the report made by the minority of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads on the bill (H. R. 2409) granting letter-carriers in first and second class post-offices thirty days' leave of absence in each fiscal year should be read in connection with this Senate bill.

Mr. WILLIS. If printed in the RECORD, will it not answer?

Mr. COSGROVE. No; I wish it read in the hearing of the House. It will cost about $200,000 to grant this leave of absence.

The SPEAKER. The clerk will read the views of the minority.

The Clerk read as follows:

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The undersigned, members of your Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, beg leave to submit the following as the views of the minority upon House bill 2409:

This bill has been reported favorably by the majority of this committee. If it becomes a law, a leave of absence of fifteen days will have to be granted to each letter-carrier in the service annually with pay. There are now—

1,985 carriers at	$1,000 per annum	$1,985,000
891 carriers at	850 per annum	757,350
367 carriers at	800 per annum	293,600
645 carriers at	600 per annum	387,000
3,888		3,422,950

This shows an average annual compensation to each carrier of $956.64. The Postmaster-General will have to supply the places of these 3,888 carriers during their absence, and the substitutes will have to be paid out of appropriations made by Congress. These substitutes are entitled to receive, under existing law, the same rate of compensation now paid to carriers whose routes they may be called upon to serve. This will require an additional appropriation to keep up the service as at present constituted of $142,602.97 annually. This, it will be seen, does not take into consideration the fact that additional carriers may be employed as the service may require, in which case the amount of appropriation will have to be correspondingly increased by Congress.

It was claimed during the discussion of the Post-Office appropriation bill at the present session that the amount appropriated for this branch of the service was inadequate and that the carrier system would be rendered inefficient. To pass this bill and make a greater deficiency will certainly not promote the efficiency of this important branch of the public service. We are opposed to the passage of this bill because it is, in our opinion, a bad and dangerous principle to enact into the form of law. If it become a law it will be the first time, so far as we are advised, that Congress has by law compelled the head of a Department of Government to grant a leave of absence to the employés for any stated period regardless of the effect such absence will have upon the public service.

The substitutes are not presumed to be as familiar with the routes as the carriers whom they will be called upon to succeed during such absence. The substitutes can not remain upon any one route for a longer space of time than fifteen days—just about a sufficient length of time to become familiar with the route—and they must either be sent to take some other route or an entire new man will have to be taken as a substitute. We presume it will be said that these substitutes will be limited in number, and that it will be managed by the Department so as to have experienced men employed as substitutes whenever and wherever practicable. This may be true; but we claim a substitute can not be kept upon any one route for more than fifteen days in one year.

The bill is erroneous in principle. It pays an employé in the public service for work which he is not expected to perform. A letter-carrier is singled out from other employés of the Government, and especially from the clerks in the different post-offices throughout the country, who are as meritorious as the carriers, and the Government is required by law to pay carriers for twelve months' service when only eleven and one-half months are required to be rendered. We believe letter-carriers are as well paid as any of the employés in the public service requiring no higher qualifications than those necessary to the proper discharge of their duties.

The clerks in the following-designated post-offices, and who no doubt possess equal if not superior qualifications than those necessarily possessed by letter-carriers, are not any better, if as well, paid as the carriers, as will appear by an inspection of the table following, showing the average compensation paid to both classes of employés in the cities mentioned.

Statement showing the average compensation of clerks in the post-offices at New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, Boston, Washington, Baltimore, and the letter-carriers of said cities.

Office.	Number of clerks in office.	Total compensation for clerks.	Average compensation for clerks.	Average compensation for carriers.
1. New York, N. Y	857	$804,739	$939	$924 78
2. Chicago, Ill	426	386,545	907	897 83
3. Philadelphia, Pa	348	266,915	767	924 43
4. Boston, Mass	296	254,325	859	937 49
5. Saint Louis, Mo	183	150,500	822	952 70
6. Washington, D. C	183	146,580	801	915 94
7. Cincinnati, Ohio	129	115,575	896	925 92
8. Baltimore, Md	106	96,750	913	911 50

We therefore recommend that the bill lie upon the table.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN COSGROVE.
JNO. H. ROGERS.
SEABORN REESE.
JNO. M. TAYLOR.
JAMES H. JONES.

Mr. COSGROVE. Now I wish to move an amendment.

Mr. COX, of New York. I rise to move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COSGROVE. I move the following amendment:

Provided, That no leave of absence shall be granted or substitute employed between the 15th day of October and 1st day of April under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. COX, of New York. I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question should be ordered there will be thirty minutes of debate allowed under the rules.

Mr. COSGROVE. I am willing the House should vote on this bill now, but when it does I think it should do so understandingly. I have given this matter attention as a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. Members representing these letter-carriers all over the country sent in petitions asking for thirty days' leave of absence. I was chairman of the subcommittee having that matter in charge. I perused a great number of these petitions and every one of them was exactly like the other. They were all printed, I should judge from the appearance, on the same printing machine and sent from the same place throughout the country to be signed by these letter-carriers, and then forwarded to Congress. In my judgment it is in no sense an expression of the opinion of any considerable number of people, but merely the expression of the wish of those who are sought to be benefited by this legislation.

The bill again is wrong in principle. I believe I am safe in saying, as I assert in this report with other gentlemen who joined me, that it is the first time as far as I have been able to discover on careful examination of the statutes of the United States where any class of employés in the public service has been by law placed upon the free-list, if I may so term it. Here are these three or four thousand employés in this particular branch of the postal service asking the passage of this bill, which seeks to give them fifteen days' leave of absence with pay.

Mr. HORR. You say there is no authority for the leave of absence——

Mr. COSGROVE. I said there was no law. There is no law authorizing it.

I understand the clerks in the Departments get it; but it is through a regulation of the Department simply, and not by law.

Mr. HORR. It extends to every Department.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Congress has allowed it to stand for about a quarter of a century without rebuking the Departments for making that regulation.

Mr. COSGROVE. That is not the question at all. I said that there was no law upon the statute-book authorizing it. But if you pass this bill why do you not also include the clerks in the different post-offices scattered throughout the country, whose pay is not so great in many instances and whose labors are just as onerous if not more so? The facts will show that they receive on an average less compensation and work more hours per day than the men who are embraced in this bill.

It is said that these gentlemen perform their work out of doors. That is true; I know it. But it is no more laborious than the work in the post-offices all over the country, where the men work in overcrowded quarters, with bad air, and suffer every inconvenience attending that kind of labor.

Another thing that should be remembered: There are thousands of men throughout the country who possess as much ability as is required for the discharge of the duties of these men who are so persistenly urging their claims upon Congress, who have applications upon file now in the Post-Office Department, and from whom the Department could employ fifteen or twenty thousand men more than the number required for this service at a much less salary than they are paying to the letter-carriers. I say that they are the best paid men of any branch of the public service requiring no higher order of qualifications than is necessary to discharge well the duties devolving upon them.

But I started out to say that there are thousands of men throughout the country in every way their equal working for one-half the wages that these men get, and who must be content with the wages they receive or starve; and I see no public reason, I see no patriotic reason, I see neither sense nor justice in singling out this particular class and saying that they shall work fifteen days less than they are paid for, and then go and employ three or four thousand substitutes to take their places, when it can have no other effect upon the public service than to demoralize it and render it less efficient.

The superintendent of the letter-carrier system, Mr. Gurley, was opposed to this matter, but after he had been pursued by these petitions and requests he finally, in the letter attached to the majority report, yielded a sort of semi-assent to it; but any gentleman who will sit down and carefully read that letter must see that he is of opinion it will only demoralize the service.

Mr. SCALES. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. COSGROVE. Certainly.

Mr. SCALES. I would like to ask what amount is involved in this bill. Suppose you have the substitute employés provided here in this bill, I would like to know what amount it would cost the Government.

Mr. COSGROVE. There are 1,985 carriers employed at a salary of $1,000 a year, which makes a total of $1,985,000. There are 891 carriers employed at an annual salary of $850 each, making a total of $757,350. There are 367 employed at a salary of $800, making a total of $293,600, and 645 carriers employed at $600 per annum, being $387,000, or a total for the 3,888 carriers of $3,422,950.

These 3,888 letter-carriers, if this bill passes, will have a leave of absence for fifteen days each during the year; and the bill further provides that the Postmaster-General shall employ 3,380 substitues during these fifteen days in their places. I claim that under the provisions of that bill these may be employed at a rate of $1,000 a year each. The substitutes are entitled to receive under existing law the same amount as the parties whose places they take and the duties of whose routes they discharge, which will be a total of $142,602.97. But if they receive a compensation at the rate of $1,000 a year instead of the amounts paid to the various routes to which they are assigned, they will receive a much larger sum—my recollection is about $175,000.

Then, again, under the bill that passed the House some time ago, and which the gentlemen upon the other side of the House so persistently resisted, we made no provision whatever for this increase of service, and I understand that there is no increase on the bill for this purpose as it passed the Senate. Of that, however, I am not positive. But the moment we pass this bill it will create a deficiency of one hundred and sixty to one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars. There is no appropriation out of which to pay this amount, and consequently there must be a deficiency.

Again, if this bill passes the leave of absence certainly ought not to be granted in the business season of the year; and while I do not know and can not say whether these 3,880 men will be all employed by the Department just at the time of an election, all know certainly that the amendment I have offered ought to be adopted so that it will not place that temptation of power in the Department.

If these 3,888 letters-carriers are to be granted leave of absence about the time of an election, and 3,888 to be employed as substitutes, I fear that my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. COX] will find that the adder he has warmed will sting him when it comes to November next. And I say if this bill is to pass, the amendment I have offered ought to be adopted for political reasons as well as for reasons which should be taken into consideration in regard to maintaining the efficiency of the service. These changes should not be made between October and April. If these men who are employed as letters-carriers are to have leave of absence they ought to have it in the warm and sweltering part of the summer.

I have expressed my views upon this bill hastily. I did not expect it was coming up this morning or perhaps I would have been able to have presented the matter more concisely. I ask how much time there is left on my side? I may want to say something in reply after the other side has been heard.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not propose to debate the question, but simply to ask that the majority report be printed in the RECORD and to comply with the gentleman's request for a yea-and-nay vote. I thank the gentleman from Missouri for withdrawing his objection and giving us a vote.

Mr. COSGROVE. I do not think I have any right to prevent the House from voting on the bill.

Mr. COX, of New York. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I ask unanimous consent that the majority report be printed with the minority report in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The report (by Mr. SKINNER, of New York) is as follows:

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2409) granting letter-carriers and clerks in first and second class post-offices thirty days' leave of absence in each fiscal year, having had the same under consideration, respectfully report:

The bill as originally introduced was as follows:

"A bill granting letter-carriers and clerks in first and second class post-offices thirty days' leave of absence in each fiscal year.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all letter-carriers at free-delivery offices, and all clerks in first and second class post-offices, shall be entitled to leave of absence at the rate of thirty days in each year, without loss of pay, upon the same conditions now granted to employés in the Post-Office Department."

After a careful consideration of the matter, and much discussion, the committee agreed to report the bill amended so as to read as follows:

"A bill granting letter-carriers fourteen days' leave of absence in each fiscal year.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all letter-carriers at free-delivery offices shall be entitled to leave of absence at the rate of fourteen days in each year, without loss of pay, under such regulations as may be adopted by the postmasters at such offices, subject to the approval of the Postmaster-General."

It will be observed that the bill as agreed upon by the committee provides simply that a leave of absence shall be granted to letter-carriers to the extent of fourteen days in each year, under such regulations as may be adopted by the postmasters at free-delivery offices, to be approved by the Postmaster-General. The committee believe that this is a just and reasonable concession to a class of employés exceptionally deserving of the favorable consideration of Congress. The duties of a letter-carrier are especially onerous and exacting, and the compensation they receive certainly not extravagant. They are required to report for duty at 6 o'clock a. m. and remain on duty until 6 or 7 o'clock p. m., and often until a later hour, in order to complete the work required of them. They are required to be on duty Sundays and holidays, while other employés of the Government have these days to themselves. If the letter-carrier loses a day through sickness or otherwise, whether that day be Sunday or a holiday, he must also lose his pay for the day lost. His work must be done with exact promptness and regularity, and no excuse for a failure in these respects is easily obtained from the public, no matter under what circumstances it may occur. In rain or shine, sun or storm, in snow or mud, he must, or is expected to, do his work equally well. These requirements, the committee believe, entitle the carrier to respectful consideration and to the relief asked for by this bill.

The weight of mail which a carrier is obliged to deliver is a matter worthy of notice. From forty to one hundred pounds of mail are delivered each day by each carrier, and oftentimes fifty pounds are delivered in a single trip. The number of miles traveled per day by the carrier, exclusive of going to and from the post-office, averages about fifteen miles, and several instances are given where the carrier walks over twenty miles per day. (These estimates are based upon results ascertained by the use of a pedometer by the carriers of the Washington post-office.)

In the English free-delivery service a carrier is allowed fifteen days leave each year without loss of pay. When sick, medicine and medical attendance are provided by the government. If a single man, sleeping apartments are furnished him, and if married a cottage is provided at a nominal rental. After a faithful service of fifteen years he may be retired with a pension; and in no case is he allowed to remain in active service longer than twenty years. These liberal provisions have helped to secure the best talent and the best service, and are worthy the attention of those who are anxious to see the free-delivery service of the United States made as perfect and efficient as possible. The cost of granting the proposed leave of absence would not be great.

On the 16th of January, 1884, there were employed as follows:

1,985 carriers, at $1,000 per year		$1,985,000
801 carriers, at	850 per year	757,350
367 carriers, at	800 per year	293,600
645 carriers, at	600 per year	387,000
3,888		3,422,950

Should every carrier employed take advantage of the privilege sought to be granted by this bill, namely, two weeks leave of absence, the cost would be one twenty-sixth part of the above sum, amounting to $131,652.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 79, noes 85.

Mr. COSGROVE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered—47 members voting therefor (more than one-fifth of the last vote).

Mr. DUNHAM. I was not in the House when the amendment was read. I should like to hear it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the amendment to be again read.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

Provided, That no leave of absence shall be granted or substitute employed between the 15th day of October and the 1st day of April under the provisions of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has just been read.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 109, nays 117, not voting 97; as follows:

There was no objection.

During the roll-call the following pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

On all questions:

Mr. RUSSELL with Mr. BLACKBURN, until further notice.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina, with Mr. CALKINS, until further notice.

Mr. TALBOT with Mr. STEELE, until further notice.

On all political questions:

Mr. SNYDER with Mr. BARR, until further notice.

Mr. GIBSON with Mr. GOFF, until further notice.

Mr. HILL with Mr. HOLTON, until further notice.

Mr. MORSE with Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, until further notice.

Mr. REAGAN with Mr. BRUMM, until further notice.

Mr. MULLER with Mr. ANDERSON, until further notice.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina, with Mr. LACEY, until further notice.

Mr. DAVIDSON with Mr. HAYNES, until further notice.

Mr. BUCKNER with Mr. KELLOGG, until further notice.

Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. THOMAS, until further notice.

Mr. LE FEVRE with Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio, until further notice.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York, with Mr. HOOPER, until further notice.

Mr. PAIGE with Mr. BOUTELLE, until further notice.

Mr. DUNCAN with Mr. SMITH, until further notice.

Mr. DOCKERY with Mr. BREWER, of New Jersey, until further notice.

Mr. CONVERSE with Mr. HOUK, until further notice.

Mr. MATSON with Mr. LIBBEY, until further notice.

Mr. CLARDY with Mr. J. S. WISE, until further notice.

Mr. YOUNG with Mr RICE, until further notice.

Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. CHACE, until further notice.

Mr. MORGAN with Mr. BRAINERD, until further notice.

The following were also announced as paired:

Mr. JONES, of Alabama, with Mr. BURLEIGH, until June 25.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, with Mr. KETCHAM, until June 30.

Mr. LAMB with Mr. LONG, until June 28.

Mr. GRAVES with Mr. MORRILL, until June 26.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York, with Mr. PAYSON, until June 25.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, with Mr. PETTIBONE, until June 27.

Mr. SKINNER, of North Carolina, with Mr. WAIT, until June 27.

Mr. WILKINS with Mr. REED, until June 27.

Mr. CABELL with Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, for this day.

Mr. CLAY with Mr. WHITING, for this day.

Mr. SPRINGER with Mr. BAYNE, for this day.

Mr. BLOUNT with Mr. KASSON, for this day.

Mr. WOODWARD with Mr. NELSON, on this vote.

Mr. DUNN with Mr. JEFFORDS, on this vote.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, with Mr. MCCORMICK, on this vote.

Mr. CALDWELL with Mr. BELFORD, on this vote.

Mr. COSGROVE (having voted in the affirmative). I desire to change my vote to the negative.

The SPEAKER. The change will be made.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and also move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. COSGROVE. I was on the floor before the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am entitled to take control of the matter now.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] rise?

Mr. COSGROVE. To move to reconsider the vote just taken.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has made that motion, and has also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. COSGROVE. I desire to say——

Many MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The motion is not debatable. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] moves to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] was not agreed to; and also moves that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. COSGROVE. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and there were 30 in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. Those voting in favor of the yeas and nays are 30—not one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. COSGROVE. I ask that the other side be counted.

The negative was counted, 107.

The SPEAKER. More than one-fifth have voted to order the yeas and nays.

Mr. COX, of New York. I think we can save time by not having the yeas and nays, and I therefore call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. COX, of New York, and Mr. COSGROVE were appointed.

Mr. COSGROVE. I desire to submit a proposition to the House.

Mr. COX, of New York. I hope that the House will hear it.

Mr. COSGROVE. I am perfectly willing to so modify my amendment as to cover the period between the 1st of October and the 1st of December. It has been suggested by several gentlemen on the other side that the amendment so modified would not be objected to.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I desire to say that the only trouble about any amendment is that it will endanger the passage of the bill through the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Tellers have been ordered upon the demand for the yeas and nays.

The tellers took their places, but without concluding the count,

Mr. COX, of New York (one of the tellers), said: I withdraw all further opposition to ordering the yeas and nays. A sufficient number of members have passed between the tellers already to order them.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 123, nays 99, not voting 101; as follows:

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. CALDWELL with Mr. PHELPS, for this day.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. COX, of New York. I call for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. COSGROVE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it now in order to move to commit this bill to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads with instructions?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. COSGROVE. I move that the bill be referred to that committee with instructions to report it back with an amendment providing "that the leave of absence and the employment of substitutes under the provisions of this act shall not be between the 1st day of October and the 1st day of December." On this motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Missouri whether the bill on this subject reported during this session from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads contains the provision which he wants to have ingrafted on this bill?

Mr. COSGROVE. I am willing that this bill should be reported back at once.

Mr. COX, of New York. It was agreed between my friend from Missouri and myself that the yeas and nays should be taken on the passage of the bill——

Mr. COSGROVE. I expect to have the yeas and nays on that question.

Mr. COX, of New York. But I would not like to have the bill killed by a reference to a committee at this time; and I think such will be the inevitable effect of adopting this motion.

Mr. COSGROVE. I do not think so.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri, my colleague on the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to the fact that the provision which he desires to ingraft on this bill is not contained in the bill reported by our committee at this session. Therefore it seems to me that this motion of the gentleman is evidently a dilatory motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] has called for the yeas and nays on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads with the instructions he has stated.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being—ayes 29, noes 109—more than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 74, nays 148, not voting 101; as follows:

So the motion of Mr. COSGROVE to commit the bill with instructions to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads was not agreed to.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. BLAND with Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire, on this vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HATCH, of Missouri). The question is now on the passage of the bill, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. COX, of New York. I hope my friend from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] will not insist upon the yeas and nays on this question. We have already had a test-vote several times. I appeal to him to withdraw the call in order to save time.

Mr. COSGROVE. So far as I am individually concerned I care nothing about having the yeas and nays on this question. But several gentlemen have requested me to adhere to the agreement that we should have the yeas and nays, and I would not like to withdraw the demand.

Mr. COX, of New York. The order for the yeas and nays can be vacated by unanimous consent.

Mr. COSGROVE. I shall not ask unanimous consent.

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask unanimous consent that the agreement for taking the yeas and nays on the passage of this bill be vacated.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to know in what respect this bill differs from the one reported by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of this House. As I understand, the two bills are the same; and this ought to be passed if we are going to stand by our committee. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The bill was passed.

Mr. COX, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 6021) to authorize the National Bank of Middletown, Pa., to change its location and name.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. 1340) to establish and maintain a bureau of labor statistics.

DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOLLETT. I present the following privileged report:

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6656) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 20, 30, 39, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 60, 61, 62, 63, 69, and 70.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 21, 22, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 38, 41, 42, 44, 50, 52, 53, 54, 56, 57, 58, 59, 65, 66, 67, 68, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$263,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$468,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 40, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$25,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 43, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$128,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 51, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$837,100;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 55, with an amendment as follows: In line 10 of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment strike out the word "private" and in lieu thereof insert the word "fireman;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 64 and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"That the act entitled 'An act to protect Holmead Cemetery, in the District of Columbia,' approved March 3, 1879, be amended by adding the words 'and convey,' after the word 'sell;' so as to make it read, 'sell and convey any part or the whole of said square.'"

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 71, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by said amendment insert the following:

"And where special assessments have been reduced on revision, as required by law, drawback certificates receivable for all arrears of general taxes due and unpaid June 30, 1882, shall be issued to the holders of outstanding lien certificates for the interest accrued on the amount of such reduction up to the date of the passage of this act."

And the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN F. FOLLETT,
WALDO HUTCHINS,
Managers on the part of the House.
P. B. PLUMB,
H. L. DAWES,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the statement which the rule provides shall accompany all conference reports.

The Clerk read as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill H. R. 6656, making appropriations for the expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year 1885, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action recommended on each amendment in the accompanying conference report.

On amendments 1, 2, 3, and 4: Provides for a messenger at $480 and increases the amount for contingent expenses in the office of the commissioners to $2,500.

On amendments 5, 6, and 7: Provides for one clerk at $1,000 and two clerks at $900 each, in lieu of one messenger in the assessor's office at $600.

On amendments 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12: Provides for a chief clerk to act as deputy auditor in lieu of a clerk at $1,400, for one additional clerk at $1,200, and $1,000 for temporary clerk-hire in the auditor's office.

On amendment 13: Inserts the following:

"For temporary clerk-hire to enable the auditor to bring up the books and arrange the accounts of his office and to audit the books of the collector, $143.96, to be immediately available."

On amendments 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, and 19: In the engineer's office, provides for three clerks at $1,200 each; that the fees collected by the inspector of gas and meters and by the harbor master shall be paid into the Treasury to the credit of the United States and of the District in equal parts; for one assistant inspector of plumbing, at $1,000, and for necessary office expenses of the inspector of gas and meters, $600.

On amendment 20: Strikes out the following:

"And the sum of $85,000 appropriated for the Boundary-street intercepting sewer by the act approved July 1, 1882, is hereby reappropriated and made immediately available for prosecuting the work under the contracts heretofore made for its expenditure or such future contracts as shall be made therefor.

On amendments 21, 22, and 23: Appropriates $263,000 for works on sundry avenues and streets, and corrects the total stated in a paragraph.

On amendments 25, 26, 27, and 28: Provides for a blacksmith at $240, and for a hostler and ambulance driver at $120 each for the Washington Asylum.

On amendments 29 and 30: Appropriates $22,600 for subsistence for the Reform School.

On amendment 31: Appropriates $2,000 for heating apparatus and for furnishing new building for the National Association for Destitute Colored Women and Children.

On amendments 32, 33, 34, 35, and 36: Makes verbal corrections in the text of the bill, and inserts the following:

"That the appropriation of $5,000 made by the act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, approved July 1, 1882, 'for the erection of a building on the grounds recently purchased by the German Protestant Orphan Asylum Association of the District of Columbia, now the German Orphan Asylum Association of the District of Columbia, provided that the asylum shall contribute an equal sum for this purpose,' and continued and made available for the same purpose and subject to the like condition for the fiscal year 1884 by the act approved March 3, 1883, be, and the same is hereby, reappropriated and made avilable, without condition, for the uses of the institution, in the discretion of the board of directors."

On amendments 37 and 38: Provides that the report of the District commissioners, in reference to the institutions of charity, shall also include such recommendations as the commissioners may deem proper concerning the necessity for such institutions, together with a plan for their organization and management and estimates of appropriations necessary for their maintenance.

On amendments 39, 40, 41, 42, and 43: Appropriates $25,000 for current repairs to county roads and suburban streets; $22,000 for cleaning and repairing lateral sewers and basins, and $3,000 for repairs to pumps.

On amendments 44, 45, 46, 47, and 48: Leaves the paragraph containing the provisions for street lighting just as it passed the House, except that provision is made to replace lamp-posts that are old, damaged, and unfit for use.

On amendments 49, 50, 51: Provides for ten lieutenants of the police force at $1,320 each, and one driver at $320.

On amendment 52: Inserts the following:

"To purchase, if on due trial found useful and necessary, twenty Gamewell alarm telegraph and telephone police stations, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

On amendments 53, 54, and 55: Fixes the pay of firemen at $780 each, and provides that the commissioners shall deduct $1 each month from the monthly pay of each fireman, which sum so deducted shall be kept as a firemen's relief fund, under the control of the commissioners, and shall be used for the relief of any fireman who by accident, while in actual performance of duty, shall become so permanently disabled as to be discharged from service therefor, and in case of his death, leaving a widow or children under 16 years of age, for their relief: Provided further, That such relief shall not exceed for any one fireman or his family the sum of $40 per month.

On amendment 56: Inserts the following:

"To pay Rezin W. Darby the amount due him on his contract for remodeling the Georgetown town hall and converting the same into a fire-engine house, $1,658.61. And the amount which shall be received from the sale of the Georgetown fish-wharf, authorized by the act of March 3, 1883, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States."

On amendments 57, 58, and 59: Fixes the salary of the clerk of the police court at $2,000.

On amendments 60, 61, 62, and 63: Leaves the provisions touching the public schools and school building just as it passed the House, except that the number of new buildings to be erected is not fixed.

On amendment 64: Inserts the following: "That the act entitled 'An act to protect the Holmead Cemetery, in the District of Columbia,' approved March 3, 1879, be amended by adding the words 'and convey,' after the word 'sell,' so as to make it read 'sell and convey any part or the whole of said square.'"

On amendments 65 and 66: Provides for the purchase of ambulance, horse, and harness, and pay of a driver, $1,200, for the Health Department.

On amendments 67 and 68: Inserts the following: "That all appropriations for contingent expenses made by this act shall be expended under the direction and in the sole discretion of the commissioners of the District of Columbia; but such expenditures shall be accounted for in the Treasury Department as other expenditures for the District, and a detailed statement of such expenditures shall be reported to Congress in accordance with section 193 Revised Statutes of the United States."

On amendments 69 and 70: Leaves the provisions affecting the water department just as the bill passed the House.

On amendment 71: Inserts the following:

"And where special assessments have been reduced on revision as required by law, drawback certificates receivable for all arrears of general taxes due and unpaid June 30, 1882, shall be issued to the holders of outstanding lien certificates for the interest accrued on the amount of such reduction up to the date of the passage of this act."

The aggregate of the bill as agreed upon and which is payable from the Treasury is $1,686,743.27, being a reduction under the amount as it passed the Senate of $34,420, an increase of $9,451.29 over the bill as it passed the House, and $13,953.96 decrease under the law for the current year.

JOHN F. FOLLETT,
WALDO HUTCHINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. FOLLETT. Mr. Speaker, the explanation which has just been read is complete so far as the action of the conference committee is concerned, and I move the conference report be agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. I ask my colleague to yield to me a minute.

Mr. FOLLETT. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I did not sign this conference report, Mr. Speaker, and my reason for not doing so was on account of Senate amendment numbered 71, from which the Senate receded with an amendment. I did not believe the matter agreed to in conference was properly before it, as it was neither in the House bill nor in the bill as it passed the Senate. Prior to the meeting of the conference I had not given the subject investigation, nor have I been able to do so since sufficiently to have a fixed opinion as to its merits. I presume the gentlemen who have signed the conference report have done so. It was, however, sufficient for me, not believing it to be a matter properly in conference, to withhold my signature from the report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. FOLLETT moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EVENING SESSION FOR COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to ask that this resolution which I send to the desk be read, and unanimous consent requested to put the same upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House shall take a recess at 5 o'clock this afternoon to reassemble at 8 o'clock for the sole purpose of considering bills from the Committee on Military Affairs and Senate bills on the Speaker's table, the subject-matter of which have been considered by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ROSECRANS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. ROSECRANS. Mr. Speaker, I perceive that the resolution which I sent up a few moments since, by an error of the Clerk in copying it, omits to make provision for an evening session to-morrow. The intention of the committee was to ask that two evenings be set apart for this business. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the resolution as adopted be modified so as to provide for the same order to-morrow afternoon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the modification suggested by the gentleman from California?

Mr. KEIFER. I think it had better stand for the present as it is. There may be some other business of importance for to-morrow evening. I do not object to the session to-night of course which has been agreed upon.

Mr. ROSECRANS. The difficulty is to get recognition.

ZUNI INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. OURY. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report, with favorable recommendation, a resolution of inquiry referred to that committee.

The SPEAKER. This is a privileged report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred House resolution 358, have considered the same, and report the same back with the recommendation that it be adopted.

The committee find some person or persons have laid claim to a portion of the Zuni Indian reservation in the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, and that it is necessary to have all the information in the Interior Department in order to ascertain what legislation, if any, is necessary to settle any disputed questions of title to lands on said reservation, as well as to furnish the Committee on Expenditures with desired information in the prosecution of its labors.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution reported back by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to furnish the House of Representatives with copies of all reports, correspondence, and other papers on file in the Interior Department relating to the alleged claims of any person to a portion of the lands of the Zuni Indian reservation in the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona and the restoration of such lands to said reservation, and also to inform the House what action the Department has taken in the premises.

Mr. VALENTINE. Does that require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It is a privileged report from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COBB. I call up the regular order, which is the unfinished business.

Mr. COOK. Mr. Speaker, I gave notice some time ago that I would call up the Chalmers-Manning contest, but I find the minority on that side has not had its views printed; and, yielding to their request, I allow the case to go over until to-morrow, and will then call it up again.

Mr. WILLIS. I wish to make an inquiry as to whether it would be in order to move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. It will be in order if the House declines to consider the unfinished business.

Mr. WILLIS. Then I ask permission to make a statement, which will not exceed perhaps a quarter of a minute.

Mr. COBB. I will consent to that if the gentleman will allow me the same length of time to make a counter-statement.

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

I desire to say that under instructions from the Committee on Education over six months ago we reported a bill, which is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Nearly three months ago the Senate passed an educational bill. I am required by that committee and shall endeavor to obtain consideration of one or the other of these bills, but I do not desire from morning to morning to occupy the time of the House with an endeavor to secure their consideration. If, then, the House will by a yea-and-nay vote give me my instructions in the premises I will abide by that decision, and I will ask a yea-and-nay vote whether it is the pleasure of this House to take up for consideration one of these educational bills.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Why can not we do that now by unanimous consent? [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky was permitted to make a brief statement upon condition that the gentleman from Indiana should have the same privilege.

Mr. COBB. I desire to state, Mr. Speaker, that this land-grant question is quite as important as any we have before us. The late convention of the Republican party indorsed the forfeiture of the land grants.

A MEMBER. And the educational bill, too.

Mr. COBB. And the educational bill, too, as I am informed. So far as our Committee on the Public Lands is concerned we have worked very faithfully at this business, and have presented a number of bills for the consideration of the House which we are in hopes of reaching and passing at this session.

Mr. VALENTINE. By what right is this debate going on?

The SPEAKER. By consent of the House. Consent was given to the gentleman from Kentucky to make a statement upon condition that the gentleman from Indiana who called up the unfinished business might also make a brief statement.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. EATON. I do not want a quarter of a minute or a quarter of an hour in which to make any statement. But I think the unfinished business is the bill reported by the Committee on the Law respecting the Election of President and Vice-President; and I therefore propose to call up that bill.

The SPEAKER. There is pending as unfinished business a report from the Committee on Public Lands, a bill to repeal the pre-emption laws and the timber-culture laws to which various amendments have been offered and on which the previous question has been ordered; there is also an unfinished report from the Select Committee on the Law respecting the Election of President and Vice-President to which various amendments have been offered and on which likewise the previous question has been ordered. But the report from the Committee on Public Lands comes first. It was unfinished business having priority when the other bill was taken up. As soon as that is disposed of, the bill to which the gentleman from Connecticut refers will be the regular order as unfinished business.

Mr. WILLIS. I raise the question of consideration against the unfinished business, my purpose being to ask the House to take up for consideration the education bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. KEIFER. Has the previous question been ordered?

The SPEAKER. It has been ordered on the amendments and engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. KEIFER. I doubt very much if the question of consideration can be raised against a bill on which the previous question has been ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has some doubts. It has been the custom of the House to take up at once as unfinished business bills on which the previous question has been ordered. It happens that in this case there are two bills precisely in the same situation.

Mr. KEIFER. Then they should be taken in the order of priority.

The question being put, the House determined to consider the unfinished business, being the report of the Committee on the Public Lands.

PRE-EMPTION AND TIMBER-CULTURE LAWS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7004) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands and the laws allowing entries for timber-culture.

Mr. COBB. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to supply words which were by mistake left out in the printed bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. Pending that, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] asks unanimous consent to correct what he states is an erroneous print of the bill. The gentleman will send up his amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 2 of the bill as follows: Insert after "2468," in line 4, these words: "and all other laws upon the subject;" so that it will read:

"That sections 2464, 2465, 2466, 2467, and 2468 and all other laws upon the subject be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

Mr. VALENTINE. I object.

Mr. COBB. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered on the bill and amendments. I do so because it is important that this amendment shall be made.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider can only be entertained by unanimous consent, more than two days having elapsed since the previous question was ordered.

Mr. COBB. I think the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. VALENTINE] if he understood the amendment would not antagonize it.

Mr. VALENTINE. It is too broad. I certainly shall object.

Mr. COBB. There were two acts intended to be repealed——

Mr. VALENTINE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being insisted upon, the Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana and the amendment proposed to that by the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. HOLMAN, as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act no public lands of the United States adapted to agriculture shall be sold except mineral lands and town sites, and all public lands of the United States adapted to agriculture shall be reserved for actual and bona fide settlers only under the provisions of the homestead laws, subject, however, to bounty-land warrants and college scrip issued by authority of Congress and grants which Congress has heretofore made or shall hereafter make in new States and Territories for the purpose of education; but all laws and parts of laws touching the rights of the officers, soldiers, and seamen heretofore in the military or naval service of the United States in the public lands are continued in full force.

The SPEAKER. To that amendment the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] has moved an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "adapted to agriculture," where they first occur in Mr. HOLMAN'S amendment, and in lieu thereof insert "which shall be decided by the Interior Department to be more valuable in the market for agricultural purposes than for the timber thereon."

The question being taken on the adoption of Mr. HERBERT'S amendment, there were ayes 17. Before the negative vote was counted,

The SPEAKER said: The Chair finds that when this bill was formerly under consideration the yeas and nays were ordered on this amendment and were taken, but no quorum voted.

Mr. HERBERT. I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The House had ordered them; but the yeas and nays being taken disclosed the fact that a quorum had not voted.

Mr. HERBERT. I am satisfied that taking the yeas and nays would merely be consuming time. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the order for the yeas and nays be vacated.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair then will complete the rising vote.

The negative vote was taken; and the Speaker announced that there were—ayes 17, noes 39.

Mr. BLANCHARD. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. BLANCHARD, and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. COBB.

Mr. POLAND. Let the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 26, noes 124.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment, being one that was offered by the gentleman from Washington Territory [Mr. BRENTS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of section 6 the following:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to amend or repeal an act for the sale of timber-lands in the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada, and in Washington Territory, passed June 3, 1878."

Mr. HOLMAN. Was that amendment pending?

The SPEAKER. Amendments were offered and allowed to be considered as pending, and then the previous question was ordered on the bill and amendments.

The question being taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. BRENTS, there were—ayes 32, noes 13.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was one offered by Mr. DUNN, to add to the bill the following:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to impair, defeat, or in any manner affect the rights of any State to indemnity for swamp and overflowed lands granted to the State of Arkansas and to other States under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to enable the State of Arkansas and other States to reclaim the swamp lands within the limits," approved September 28, 1850, as provided in sections 2479, 2480, 2481, 2482, 2483, 2484, 2485, 2486, 2487, 2488, 2489, and 2490 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was one offered by Mr. PETERS, to add to section 1 of the bill the following:

Provided, That when it is ascertained, after investigation, that any quarter-section of land entered under the provisions of the homestead, pre-emption, or timber-culture laws charged to have been fraudulently entered has been transferred to an innocent holder, without any collusion between such holder and the person charged with the fraudulent entry, then in such case or cases patents for such lands may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be issued.

The question was taken upon agreeing to the amendment by a viva voce vote, and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. PETERS. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 14, noes 47.

So (no further count being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to move to recommit this bill with instructions.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

Mr. NELSON. Then I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands with instruction to so amend the bill as to retain the pre-emption law, but modified so that it shall not apply to pine lands, and so that final proof and entry can not be made till after settlement and cultivation for a period of not less than thirty months.

Mr. ANDERSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have prepared a resolution to recommit this bill to the Committee on Public Lands with instructions to report amendments to the timber-culture and pre-emption laws, which will obviate fraudulent practices under those laws. Is it in order for me to move that as a substitute for the motion submitted by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] or to submit it afterward?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can offer it as a substitute, or should the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] be voted down, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] can then submit his motion.

The motion of Mr. NELSON to recommit was not agreed to.

Mr. COBB. I now move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. Pending the demand for the previous question, I submit the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands with instructions to report such amendments to the pre-emption and timber-culture laws as will prevent fraudulent practices thereunder.

Mr. KEIFER. Has there not been a vote on a motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER. That was the ordinary motion to recommit before the previous question was demanded.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. ANDERSON; and upon a division there were—ayes 27, noes 61.

Mr. VALENTINE. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. VALENTINE and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 27, noes 103.

Mr. VALENTINE (one of the tellers). No quorum has voted. It is my duty to my constituents to see that such a measure as this is not passed without a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will continue the count, and gentlemen who have not voted will please come forward and vote on one side or the other.

The tellers continued and concluded the count, and reported that there were—ayes 47, noes 117.

So the motion of Mr. ANDERSON was not agreed to.

The previous question was ordered upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. VALENTINE and Mr. ANDERSON called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 149, nays 40, not voting 134; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will announce the additional pairs.

The following were announced as paired on this vote:

Mr. RIGGS with Mr. HANBACK.

Mr. COOK with Mr. STEPHENSON.

Mr. ROBERTSON with Mr. GEORGE.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, with Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri.

Mr. FORNEY with Mr. KEIFER.

Mr. BROADHEAD with Mr. RYAN.

The following were announced as paired for this day:

Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania, with Mr. CUTCHEON.

Mr. THOMPSON with Mr. STRUBLE.

Mr. FIEDLER with Mr. DINGLEY.

Mr. DOWD with Mr. CAMPBELL, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. SUMNER, of Wisconsin, with Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire.

Mr. MULDROW with Mr. HARMER.

Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, if I were not paired on this question I should vote "ay."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed a joint resolution of the following title:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 167) granting permission to exhibit in the Capitol a model of the pedestal of the Bartholdi statue of Liberty enlightening the world.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded. It is the unfinished business——

Mr. LEWIS. I move that the House proceed to consider bills in relation to land grants, reported by the Committee on Public Lands, such bills to be considered in the order in which they stand upon the Calendar.

Mr. EATON. As I have understood the suggestion of the Chair, the next business now in order is the unfinished business coming over from Saturday last—the bill providing for the count of the electoral vote. The previous question has been ordered upon that bill. I now call for the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] demands the regular order, which is the unfinished business, upon which the previous question has been ordered. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LEWIS] desires, as the Chair understands, to raise the question of consideration.

Mr. LEWIS. If I recollect aright the order of the House under which the bill in reference to the electoral count was taken up, it is subject to matters reported under the Holman resolution, and therefore my motion takes precedence of that of the gentleman from Connecticut.

The SPEAKER. The difficulty is that the bill which the gentleman from Connecticut calls up was under consideration and the previous question was ordered upon the amendments and on ordering the bill to a third reading. In other words, the House directed that the main question should be put at once on those propositions. The Chair thinks that in this position of the case——

Mr. LEWIS. I am perfectly willing——

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. LEWIS. I understand that under the rules the gentleman in charge of the electoral-count bill will have the right, if that bill is taken up, to occupy one hour in closing the debate. If he will agree that there shall be no discussion, but that the vote be taken at once on the bill, I will not antagonize his proposition.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not believe that this question has ever been held in the House otherwise than according to the present ruling of the Chair.

Mr. VALENTINE. I understand the Chair has ruled that the question of consideration can be raised against the measure in charge of the gentleman from Connecticut although the previous question has been ordered.

The SPEAKER. This morning, when the regular order was first demanded, after the bill in relation to letter-carriers had been disposed of, the Chair allowed the question of consideration to be raised against a bill on which the previous question had been ordered simply because there were two bills in the same situation precisely.

Mr. VALENTINE. That, I think, was correct.

The SPEAKER. The Chair held that the House should have the right in such a case to determine which bill it would take up.

Mr. VALENTINE. And I understand there is now but one bill in this position.

The SPEAKER. There is but one; and the Chair thinks that under the practice of the House, although there is no positive rule upon the subject, the bill on which the previous question has been ordered comes up as a matter of course.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Although there is no positive rule, Mr. Speaker, there have been a great many decisions.

The SPEAKER. There have been a great many decisions and there has been a long practice in the House, although there is no positive rule.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the electoral count bill, whether he intends to consume any time in discussion?

Mr. EATON. The previous question has been ordered, and the rules of the House limit the debate. The more quickly we get at this bill the more quickly we shall dispose of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut will proceed.

Mr. LEWIS. I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the question of consideration can not be raised against the bill when the House by a vote has directed that the question be put.

COUNT OF ELECTORAL VOTE.

The House accordingly resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 25), to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and for the decision of questions arising thereon.

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, I believe the Chair holds that this bill is now before the House for consideration?

The SPEAKER. He does.

Mr. HART. There is, I understand, an hour for further debate, one-half of which is to be occcupied by those who oppose the substitute.

The SPEAKER. That is not the rule of the House.

Mr. HART. I understand it to be the arrangement.

The SPEAKER. The rule would allow one hour for closing the debate, to be controlled by the gentleman who reported the bill.

Mr. EATON. The arrangement is that one-half of the closing hour shall be occupied by gentlemen opposed to the substitute reported by the House committee. I yield half an hour to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HART], who will dispose of it as he chooses.

Mr. HART. I yield twenty minutes of my time to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, I believe this Congress at this session ought to pass some law on this question. The situation is just as it was eight years ago. We are entering on what is likely to be a very exciting Presidential campaign. The House is Democratic and the Senate is Republican, and if we adjourn this session without having agreed upon any rule or any law which shall regulate the count of the electoral vote we may have a deadlock again next winter. I do not believe the country would submit to another electoralcommission. Upon the passage of some law now to regulate the count may depend the peace of the country and the perpetuity of our institutions. I believe that a bad law would be better than no law at all, for the law-abiding conservative spirit of the people of this country would cause the people to acquiesce in whatever decision might be made according to a law agreed upon before the quarrel or dispute had arisen.

I am in favor of the Senate bill and against the substitute reported by the House committee. That substitute provides that the Senate and House shall merge into one body, that Senators and Representatives shall vote per capita on every question as it arises.

The distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] who reported the substitute said in his opening remarks that it was unconstitutional. I agree with him.

Mr. EATON. Not quite that.

Mr. HERBERT. I so understood you. He says he did not say it. I doubt the constitutionality of his substitute, but for a very different reason from that given by him.

He says it is the duty of the House under the Constitution to count the votes of the electors, and he derives that power from the fact that the Constitution imposes upon the House the election of a President if none shall be chosen by the electors. With all due deference I think that is a non sequitur. It is true that under the law whatever party or power is to fill a vacancy must first decide that a vacancy exists, but it does not necessarily follow that the person or body which has the filling of a vacancy must find or declare the vacancy in the first instance.

I need not go beyond the organization of this House for an illustration of that. The gentleman from Connecticut was elected to this House under the laws of Connecticut. But if when he came here there had been a contest between him and another, and this House had decided that the election was void and the seat was vacant, on the governor of Connecticut would have devolved the duty to take the first step in filling the vacancy. He would act on the declaration of this House that there was a vacancy and issue his writ for an election. So in this case. It does not at all follow from the fact that this House has devolved upon it the duty of electing a President if the electors choose none that it has the right under the Constitution to count the vote. That same provision of the Constitution gives the right also to the Senate to elect a Vice-President in case none has been elected by the electors.

Then we would have according to his reasoning two bodies, the House of Representatives and the Senate, each entitled to count these votes. How could that be done? Would the gentleman split his logic, and say that under the Constitution the House would have the right to count the votes for President and the Senate would have the right to count the votes for Vice-President. Who ever heard of such an idea? I think the mere statement of the proposition is its sufficient refutation.

But, Mr. Speaker, the Constitution provides that the President of the Senate, to whom the certificates of returns have been transmitted, "shall open the certificates in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives."

It is further provided, after he shall have so opened the certificates, that "the votes shall then be counted." It has always been understood from the beginning of the Government, now nearly one hundred years, lacking but one to complete all the counts in the century since the Government began, that the Senate acted as a Senate, as an organized body, and the House of Representatives also as an organized body, each equal in power and authority over the count to the other.

The word Senate as used in the Constitution has a distinct and definite signification—an organized political entity. So the words House of Representatives mean this House organized as such.

But this House substitute provides that when the Senate comes over here it shall give up its autonomy; that it shall not come here as a Senate, but that the Senators shall come simply as voters. It provides that the seventy-six Senators shall merge themselves with the members of this House, where they, the representatives of thirty-eight States, will have less power than the Representatives of three States on this floor. Do you seriously invite the Senate to that kind of a feast? Another consequence which has been alluded to in this debate: The Senate to-day is Republican, the House Democratic, and, as I have said, all the precedents, without a single exception, point to the conclusion that each is to be equal to the other in power and authority over the count. Do you seriously ask the Senate, a Republican Senate, to come over here and give up its power and merge its membership into the membership of this House, and give us Democrats over seventy majority in the count of the next Presidential vote?

Mr. MILLS. Let me interrupt the gentleman from Alabama for a moment. Does the gentleman from Alabama pretend that any one can be legally declared to be elected President of the United States without the consent of the House of Representatives?

Mr. HERBERT. I do not, as a general proposition; though I do contend, and I am coming to that, that Congress has the right to legislate upon that subject and prescribe rules of evidence by which both Houses shall be guided in conducting the count.

Mr. MILLS. But let me call the gentleman's attention to this: The Constitution declares that the House of Representatives shall, in the event of a certain contingency, proceed to elect a President of the United States. Now, according to the rules of law as I understand them, when a power is conferred upon any body to do a certain thing upon the happening of a certain contingency, the power is also vested in that body to determine the time that that contingency has happened. Hence, when the House finds that no one has been elected, it is its duty to proceed under the Constitution to elect a President.

Mr. HERBERT. I have already answered that the same or a similar power is conferred upon the Senate as upon the House of Representatives, and I believe with the gentleman from Texas that if the two Houses were in dispute, and no one could be declared elected by the consent of both Houses, and that the count had failed to declare that anybody was elected, then in that event it would devolve upon the House to elect a President, and upon the Senate to elect a Vice-President. But that is a question we need not go into at this time. I want to provide by law how the count shall be conducted, so that it may not fail.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If that position be a sound one, all you need to do to confer jurisdiction upon the House to proceed to elect a President is to have the two Houses disagree. That leaves it then, according to the gentleman's theory, in the discretion of the House. A most singular condition of affairs.

Mr. EATON. That is a new theory altogether.

Mr. HERBERT. The dispute that would arise right at that point is well illustrated by this colloquy. I never want to see this country brought into the condition where the House of Representatives will be claiming the right to elect a President because the two Houses have been unable to agree that anybody has been elected, the House contending for, and the Senate, and perhaps the President, disputing that right. I believe that it is our duty now to adopt a measure that will avoid questions of that kind. I would avoid the very question that has arisen here. By an exercise of the power the Constitution gives (when it confers all powers necessary and proper to carry into execution any power granted to Congress, or to any Department or branch of this Government), I believe we are authorized to pass such a bill as the Senate has sent over to us; and I believe we ought to do it and thus settle these disputes.

As I have said, it is out of the question to pass this substitute. To stand for that is to declare for no law; for you can not expect the Senate, which can hold up precedents running back without challenge or question for ninety-six years, to give up its prerogative, its right to be a factor in the count equal to the House of Representatives.

Mr. HAMMOND. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question for information.

Mr. HERBERT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMMOND. I heard the gentleman make a remark that he intended to vote for the Senate bill. The Constitution of the United States specifically declares that—

> Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.

And again—

> The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes; which day shall be the same throughout the United States.

Now, the functions of Congress in regard to this particular thing being expressed in these words of the Constitution, by what authority can we undertake to legislate, as this Senate bill asks us to do by this second section, to fix a statute of limitation by which the State's right to select electors as it pleases is to be vacated? How can Congress get authority for either the second or the third section of the Senate act, under these words of the Constitution restricting that power to these specific things?

Mr. HERBERT. I will answer the gentleman's question right here, and then I will beg gentlemen, as only twenty minutes are given me, not to ask any other question, but to allow me to proceed with my argument, in the course of which I will endeavor to consider all the difficulties as they arise.

I answer the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] by saying the Senate bill does not undertake to interfere in any manner whatever in the second or any other section with the right of a State absolutely to choose its electors; any more than it interferes with the right of the people of the State under State laws to choose members of Congress. The Senate bill does not interfere with the election at all nor with the right of election. It simply undertakes to lay down a mode in which it shall be ascertained who has been chosen. That is all. It undertakes simply to legislate with reference to the rules of evidence by which it shall be ascertained what the State has done, what electors the State has appointed.

Why, sir, the gentleman seems to think, and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] went off upon that idea, that the right on the part of the State to choose was interfered with in some manner by the right on the part of the Federal Government to decide who has been chosen. Not so; for, as I said before, that gentleman and all of us were chosen under the laws of our States. Those laws are not interfered with, and the power of the voters is absolute to choose whom they please, but this absolute power of election is not at all inconsistent with the right resting here to decide who has been chosen. You must separate between the right to choose and the right to decide who has been chosen. The people elect members of this House. This House decides who has been chosen. A Legislature elects Senators. The Senate decides who has been chosen. The States appoint electors. The House and the Senate decide what persons have been appointed. Everywhere the Constitution gives to the Federal Government or some branch of it the right to decide who has been chosen to perform any Federal function. The Senate bill does not at all interfere with that power, and that power is not inconsistent with the power of the people or the States to choose or appoint under State authority.

But I was interrupted. I had not quite done with the substitute offered here by the House committee. I say it is not only without precedent, but so far as I know—and I have studied this question heretofore with considerable care—without any authority at all, unless it be that Mr. Alexander Stephens wrote an article in the International Review in 1878, in which he contended for the plan adopted here by the House committee. He was unable to cite any authority at all for merging the House and Senate in one body except a rejected fragment found in the handwriting of Mr. Jefferson among some old manuscripts of his forty years after his death.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HATCH, of Missouri). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Alabama be extended.

Mr. TULLY and Mr. LEWIS objected.

Mr. HART. I yield the gentleman the remaining ten minutes to which I am entitled.

Mr. HERBERT. I am much obliged to the gentleman from Ohio for his courtesy.

I understand the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] who is to follow and close this debate proposes to rely upon that fragment found among the manuscripts of Mr. Jefferson as an authority. I will say, in the first place, if you examine it you will find that it did not propose this plan. It was inconsistent with it. It was an amendment offered, or intended to be offered, to some bill, but what bill is not known. But the amendment was never offered. Mr. Jefferson is said to have written that while he was Vice-President. He was President for eight years after that, and in not a single message, in not a single letter, to no human being did he ever mention that fragment. He did not himself consider it fit to be given to the country, and it is unfair to his memory to quote it against him now.

Then I come to the Senate bill. The necessity of the Senate bill arises out of the fact that, as I have said, always heretofore the two Houses have been considered each equal to the other in the count, and they can do nothing unless they agree. When they are met here they are just like a court composed of two judges, who, unless they agree, can not render a judgment even upon a promissory note. And these two Houses, Democratic and Republican respectively, may possibly disagree. The Senate bill proposes simply to prescribe rules of evidence, according to which the count shall be regulated, and which shall enable them to arrive at a result. Congress has power to prescribe such rules by law, as I believe, under the Constitution.

Soon after the Electoral Commission in 1877, which left a profound conviction upon the minds of the American people that some mode should be agreed upon and some regulations prescribed, the Senate and the House appointed special committees to consider this question; and this Senate bill has had shed upon it at various times the light of the great intellects of Thurman, Conkling, Ben Hill, and all the great men, Democrats and Republicans, in the other end of the Capitol for the last six years. And it has passed that body, if I mistake not, four times. It passed there unanimously in the Forty-seventh Congress, and I believe it passed there unanimously this session. The Senate thinks it has reached a correct solution of the question.

It appears to me that the second clause goes a little too far if it is intended to prescribe that the judgment of a State tribunal shall be absolutely conclusive. It was at first my impression that, when taken in connection with the sections following it, it might be overruled by the joint action of the two Houses. I have therefore offered an amendment, which I am satisfied the Senate would agree to if passed here, that the judgment of a State tribunal shall be prima facie evidence, and entitle a vote to be counted, unless by the concurrent action of the two Houses it shall be overruled.

I think it is going a little too far, although I would agree to that rather than have no bill at all—I think it is going a little too far to say that the decision of a tribunal of a single State, composed of one or more men, and which might be venal, should stand against the united voice of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, representing all the States and all the people, as to who had been chosen electors for President and Vice-President. These rules which have been agreed upon by the Senate go further. In the first place, it is prescribed that if there is only one return from a State that shall be taken. Also, that if there are two returns from a State that return shall be taken which has been decided by the State tribunal to be the true return. And there are other provisions of the same character.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Suppose there are two State tribunals and they send us two decisions.

Mr. HERBERT. Unless the two Houses are unable to agree as to which of those two State tribunals is the proper one there will occur that which will be commented upon by the gentleman from Connecticut, a State might be disfranchised because of the disagreement of the two Houses as to which one of two returns shall be counted.

Mr. BROADHEAD. Does not the second section of the Senate bill leave it to the State authorities to determine absolutely whether the State vote shall be counted?

Mr. HERBERT. Yes; and I have offered an amendment to that. But to return to the question of disfranchising a State, as it is called. There is no power on earth having the right to decide any question that has not the power to decide it either wrongfully or rightfully. The Supreme Court of the United States can take away the property of A and give it to B. These two Houses, if we are to suppose that they would do so, can throw out the vote of a State. The joint convention proposed by the Eaton substitute could throw out the vote of a State. This House of Representatives can throw out the vote of a State simply by refusing to join the Senate in counting it; but is that any reason why you should deny that the power of judging who is elected shall rest here? Is the power of the Supreme Court to do wrong any reason why you should take away from that court the power to decide anything at all?

In fact the Constitution as it is, without any rule, as I have said, results in the disfranchisement of a State whenever there is a disagreement between the two Houses. If they are each equal in power and authority, and the one of them says, for instance, that the vote of Alabama shall be counted and the other says that it shall not be counted, it matters not what has been decided in Alabama, it matters not whether there are more returns than one from that State, if the two Houses without any rule should disagree, then the result would be that the vote of Alabama would not be counted.

Therefore the argument which the gentleman would use, that under the Senate bill there would be power to disfranchise a State, is against him, if he wants to prevent this being done, because every provision in that bill is for the purpose of enabling the two Houses to come to a conclusion in order to prevent that very result, to prevent the disfranchisement of a State because the two Houses can not agree. That is all it comes to at last.

Much has been said about the twenty-second joint rule. That rule simply formulated this difficulty. The difficulty has always existed in every count where the House and Senate claimed an equal right to control the count. That is, if one House objected the other House could not act without it. That is what the twenty-second joint rule provided for; it contented itself with formulating that proposition and did not go any further.

The Senate bill now proposes to go further. That bill has been elaborately discussed. I have never known any question more ably discussed or debated with more of a non-partisan spirit than that bill in the Senate. I suppose the non-partisan character of the discussion resulted largely from the inability of either side to look ahead and see what result would follow from these rules, whether they would militate against the one party or the other. [Here the hammer fell.] So it is; the bill has been ably debated; debated at much greater length than we have time for here. It is satisfactory there to Democrats and Republicans, and I hope this House will pass it.

Mr. EATON. A word or two in regard to the position my friend from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] has assumed. He says that the bill of the committee seeks to give away and to do away with the precedents of ninety years. Sir, there has never been a precedent. There can not be a precedent unless there is some position which has been assumed to make one.

Sir, for nearly a hundred years we have passed along without a precedent without any difficulty, without any question having arisen. Until 1877 a question never arose with regard to a vote; never. Gentlemen forget. Questions arose with regard to the admissibility of States, or whether the vote of a State should be counted that was cast on the day after that which Congress had fixed for casting the vote.

Mr. BROADHEAD. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. EATON. If it is not too long.

Mr. BROADHEAD. I would ask the gentleman if all the precedents have not always been uniform and to one effect—that the Senate and House of Representatives act as independent bodies?

Mr. EATON. It has always been that they were there together, with a presiding officer over an anomaly, over two Houses, one presiding officer over two Houses, called a joint body.

Mr. BROADHEAD. But whenever they acted they acted separately.

Mr. EATON. They did not act at all. My friend is too good a lawyer to talk here about acting when there was not any action for eighty years, not a particle.

Mr. HERBERT. When the question arose to which the gentleman has alluded, concerning the Wisconsin case and also other cases, did not they confer among themselves?

Mr. EATON. Sir, if we are to go in one rut and keep there regardless of wisdom and justice and what the country demands, then let us stay in that rut. It was a French statesman of wonderful power—perhaps the ablest man that France produced during a century—who said that great men made precedents and little ones followed them. Now, let us make a precedent. There has been no joint conventions. I grant it. Is that any reason why there should not be a joint convention when you have seen the necessity for such a convention? If there had been a joint convention eight years ago, as was advised by more than one or two or ten or twenty men, there would have been no electoral commission. The Congress of the United States would have determined the question, the decision of which the Constitution has devolved upon Congress.

Sir, my friend from Alabama said that I admitted the bill was unconstitutional. I did not admit that. I said that I myself had no doubt the power to determine the election of President is in the House of Representatives to-day under the Constitution. Gentlemen may draw any inference they please from that. I believe the power to be here. Jeremiah S. Black believed it to be here; Charles O'Conor believed it to be here; Matthew H. Carpenter believed it to be here; George Bancroft believed it to be here. I could go on and name fifty gentlemen, the profoundest intellects of this country, who have believed that the House of Representatives has the sole power under the Constitution, when the question arises, to determine who is the President of the United States. These men may all be mistaken, they may all be wrong, and therefore it is that a majority of the committee have presented a bill which, I agree, is not in accordance with that view of the Constitution. I do believe that this House has that power, and unless some law be passed which will prevent the exercise of that power, if within a year there should be a situation demanding its exercise, I as one member of the House of Representatives shall call on it to execute the constitutional power that belongs to it, and not go outside and take counsel with Tom, Dick, or Harry to determine who has been elected President of the United States.

But, sir, Mr. Stephens's name has been alluded to, and my friend from Alabama says that I have tortured the meaning of what Mr. Jefferson said on this subject. Sir, Mr. Jefferson said that there was a manifest reason why there should be a joint convention, because it would embrace just as many members of the Senate and the House of Representatives as there were electors chosen by the various States. Therefore he said there was a manifest reason why that rule might be adopted.

Mr. HERBERT. What does the bill recommend?

Mr. EATON. There is no bill.

Mr. HERBERT. But Mr. Jefferson's amendment—what did it recommend, taking it all together?

Mr. EATON. There is no bill. The gentleman knows it as well as I do.

Mr. HERBERT. I said "amendment."

Mr. EATON. There is no bill. The bill could not be found; and the gentleman knows it. Do not let us take up time here unnecessarily.

I want to avoid any difficulty on this subject. I report a bill. Do you doubt, my friend from Alabama [addressing Mr. HERBERT] or my friend from Missouri [addressing Mr. BROADHEAD], that you possess the requisite integrity to pass properly upon a question of this sort that comes before you as a member of the grand inquest of the American people? Who doubts his integrity to do what is just and right? If there be such men they ought not to vote for this bill. Not that all men who do not vote for it will be men of bad character—not by any means.

Now I must hasten on. My friend from Alabama is troubled with this bill of the committee because, as he affirms, it is an unconstitutional bill. He is not troubled with the Senate bill in that regard at all. Why, you could drive a four-horse cart through it anywhere and everywhere. It undertakes to determine with regard to the choosing of electors, when the State has the entire power with respect to that question. But it is nugatory, is it? It does not amount to anything? Why, then, pass it.

The effect of the Senate bill—I will not say its object, but its effect, as all intelligent men who read the bill must see, is that you may bribe a judge and in that way change the vote of the State. You put yourselves in the very position in which bribery and corruption will be apt to follow.

For the sake of illustration, take my own State. The various returning boards of the State send their canvassers to the seat of government. The secretary of state, the State treasurer, and the comptroller of the Commonwealth are the three officers who under the law of Connecticut canvass the vote and determine who have been chosen electors of President and Vice-President. When they have made their determination the governor of the State places the broad seal of the old Commonwealth upon the certificate, and it is sent to Washington. Now, what is the object of this bill?

Mr. BROADHEAD. Suppose there are two returns?

Mr. EATON. I am coming to that. "I thank thee for teaching me that word." Two returns are just what would be wanted by those who might desire to nullify the voice of the State. "Suppose there are two returns." Suppose the governor of Connecticut puts the broad seal of the State upon a paper certifying to the election of the electors, who, the canvassers say, have been chosen. Then suppose some judge gives a certificate and sends another return here. What then results from this Senate bill? The vote of Connecticut is lost. And everybody knows it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Then you assume the judiciary of Connecticut is no part of its political system, and we are not bound to abide by its decision.

Mr. BROADHEAD. I ask the gentleman from Connecticut this question——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON. I have no time to yield. If any gentleman thinks I misstate a proposition, very well. You ask me, suppose there are two returns. I illustrate it with my own State. The two returns have got here; what is the result? If the House bill is passed the joint convention determines per capita which of these two returns is the genuine return. That is the way; but what becomes of it if this bill does not pass and the Senate bill passes? One House says it is the judge's return and the other House says it is the governor's return. Poor old Connecticut loses her vote, and A B is not elected President of the United States and C D is. I propose to avoid that, no matter who is elected. I am not talking about that, whether William Thompson or John Smith——

Mr. BROADHEAD. In the end, then, this tribunal will not determine who is elected?

Mr. EATON. Yes, it will; and let me tell you what will be the result if the Senate bill passes (and the gentleman from Alabama admitted it), that you would lose the vote of the State. The State was entitled to a vote. She voted and elected—that is, my State elected—six electors; two returns come up; one is a correct return and the other is a false return. Every one agrees the correct return, whichever it is, ought to be counted; but with this Senate bill neither is counted, because the Houses do not agree when they vote concurrently, and both are thrown out, and the whole election machinery of the United States goes to the bottom.

I say, Mr. Speaker, it is our duty to prevent such action as we had. I do not wish to say a word to irritate the feelings of any man. This is above all politics. If I know myself I have not the heart or soul to talk about politics in connection with this matter. What I want is justice, right, and nothing else, and less than that, God helping me, I will never take again—never, sir.

A great deal has been said about the power of the House. I say, again, the House of Representatives in my judgment has the sole power. I want to add a letter written by a very distinguished citizen of your State, sir, one of the brightest men in this country. I allude to my friend from Massachusetts. I desire this letter to come in here as part of my speech.

A MEMBER. To whom do you refer?

Mr. EATON. To Richard S. Spofford, of Newburyport, Mass. It it a brilliant letter. It argues hard against my bill, I agree, but I want it brought in as part of the literature of this whole matter; and let it come in here.

The letter is as follows:

THE ELECTORAL VOTE—BY WHOM COUNTED.

A letter of Richard S. Spofford, of Newburyport, Mass., to Hon. William W. Eaton, of the United States Senate, upon the subject.

"When winds arise, worship the echo."—PYTHAGORAS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 10, 1877.

Hon. WILLIAM W. EATON:

MY DEAR SIR: Having been requested by you to commit to writing the views recently expressed by me in a conversation touching the electoral vote and the manner in which it is counted, I submit the following considerations, by which the position upheld by me on that occasion is sustained.

I am well aware, of course, that these considerations derive no weight from my mere personal authority; but if, as I believe I am able to do, I shall show that my conclusion is the true one, it is immaterial from what source they emanate, for then they will obtain audience not as the utterance of an individual, but of the Constitution itself. Nor does it matter at all in this view that the conclusion arrived at is entirely different from those hitherto advanced by eminent partisans on their respective sides.

First of all, I observe that in my view of the subject there is neither a casus omissus in the Constitution, nor, when the same are properly interpreted, any vagueness or uncertainty in its provisions. Indeed, to assume the fact to be otherwise, is to ascribe to the framers of the Constitution a want of foresight and intelligence utterly inconsistent with their recognized character for statesmanship and for prescience in public affairs. Least of all is it to be supposed that in a matter of so great importance as the verification of the electoral vote for the President and Vice-President anything would have been left by them to chance or inference, or to the hazards of political caprice, knowing as we do that over no feature of the Government did they deliberate with greater solicitude and circumspection.

To pretermit this inquiry, however, the question is, by whom, in the intendment of the Constitution, are the electoral votes for the President and Vice-President to be counted?

The sole provisions of the Constitution bearing upon this inquiry are found in article 12 of the amendments, in the following words:

"The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted; the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then, from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. * * * The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice-President shall be the Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list the Senate shall choose the Vice-President."

To deal, first, with the functions of the President of the Senate: It is obvious that the sole duty imposed upon him by the letter of the Constitution is "to open all the certificates," and that if he has any other power beyond this simple ministerial one, it is derived by implication, and not by express grant, that implication springing, if anywhere (for it can spring nowhere else), from the words in immediate context with those just quoted, namely, "and the votes shall then be counted."

Not even by inference, it seems to me, does the President of the Senate obtain any official authority here. Having his function confined to the opening of the certificates by words of express limitation, every canon of interpretation requires that he shall not transcend the limits of his defined authority to exercise another function of an undefined and independent character. Indeed, the opposite is the true and irresistible conclusion, namely, that, having opened all the certificates, his constitutional part has been fully performed, and he is, in this respect, functus officio.

Nor does the reason of the case fail to accord with this inevitable construction.

Otherwheres in the Constitution it is provided that the electors, in their respective States, shall make lists of the persons voted for for President and Vice-President, and these lists they are charged "to sign and certify and transmit sealed to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate."

But thus constituted the depositary of the electoral vote, and having custody of the same, it was perfectly natural and appropriate that the President of the Senate, since he alone was able to produce and identify them, should be charged with the duty of opening the certificates. But with the performance of this purely ministerial duty his functions end.

Still another point preliminary to the main issue demands attention.

Much has been said of a joint convention, in whose presence the certificates are to be opened and the vote counted.

No provision for any such body is to be found in the Constitution.

"In presence of the Senate and House of Representatives"—that is the constitutional phrase. The Senate appears in its own proper character as the Senate, presided over by the Vice-President or its appropriate presiding officer; the House in its character as such, presided over by its Speaker; and in their presence the proceedings are had. They constitute in no sense a single parliamentary body, but retain throughout a separate and individual character.

By the language of the Constitution above quoted nothing is demanded of either House or Senate except that it shall act as a witness, in whose presence all the certificates are to be opened; for though a count is provided for, the duty of performing it is not devolved either expressly or impliedly upon them. So that, if we are to confine our view to the clause in question, we may well conclude not only that the Constitution in this important particular is vague and uncertain, but absolutely dumb. Not such, however, is a true conclusion, as will be seen when we consider other sections of that instrument which have attracted but little notice in this connection, but in which the counting of the electoral vote is provided for with definite precision.

We have now, in our theory of constitutional action, the Senate and House of Representatives, in each other's presence, and the President of the Senate, charged with the duty of opening all the certificates that have been returned by the electors from their respective States. We have, too, the command of the Constitution that "the votes shall then be counted," but with no declaration by whom.

Now, it is at this precise moment that other provisions of the Constitution come into play, prescribing an intelligible and consistent mode of procedure.

What are those provisions? Let us see.

The certificates having been opened by the President of the Senate, who is their custodian under the Constitution, and the count being in order, it is provided "that the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of the electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then, from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately by ballot the President."

Here, then, for the first time we have distinct intimation by whom in the intendment of the Constitution the count of the electoral vote is to be made.

Being charged with the duty of electing a President in a defined contingency, of course the House of Representatives alone can judge when that contingency shall arise. To this end it must of necessity examine and count the electoral vote.

It must count it to ascertain its total number, that it may learn what a majority of that number is.

It must count and examine it that it may know for what candidates respectively it has been cast.

It must count and examine it to know by whom, if by any one, a majority has been received.

Finally, if no candidate have a majority, it must count and examine it to ascertain "by what persons, not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the highest numbers have been received."

And thus we perceive the reason for the indefiniteness of the words heretofore used, namely, "and the votes shall then be counted," it being clear that they are referred for an operative interpretation to the subsequent clauses of the Constitution by which the powers of the House of Representatives in this respect are defined.

It being an exclusive prerogative with which the House is clothed, its authority must be supreme, both as respects the modes of its procedure and its ultimate action. Hence follows the conclusion that its jurisdiction over the electoral count for President must be an entire and exclusive one.

I say nothing now of the possibilities of a disagreement and the evils to spring therefrom between two bodies so dissimilar in interest and character upon the theory of a joint count by the Senate and the House. But I do say that no sound construction will hold that where one branch of the Government has an exclusive and indivisible responsibility its action is to be embarrassed by the interference of another branch clothed with no authority and having no voice in the matter.

The sole duty of the Senate under the requirements of the Constitution is to take notice whether or not there has been a failure in the popular choice for Vice-President, and, if so, to proceed to fill that office from the two highest numbers on the list.

Resting the pretension that the Senate is permitted to participate in the count upon the general phrase "the votes shall then be counted," we have a forced construction of the Constitution incapable of verification, whereas the construction for which I contend harmonizes all its provisions and presents a logical and consistent system.

Not only does my conclusion conform strictly to the Constitution, but I believe it to be the only one consonant with republican liberty and our form of Government.

The framers of the Government excluded the Senate from participation in the election of the President when there had been a failure of the popular choice. And why? Assuredly because that body was recognized by them as being, in its very origin and structure, a creature beyond the control of the popular will, an irresponsible body in fact, amenable to no process, even for attempted usurpation or civic crime.

With equal prudence and discretion, as I believe, they have excluded the Senate by the Constitution from any participation in the count of the electoral vote for President, though it has a certain defined function as respects the office of Vice-President, to which I have already referred.

In short, no reason can be suggested why the Senate shall be permitted to participate in the count of the electoral vote which would not warrant its participation with the House of Representatives in the election of the President, a constitutional impossibility about which there is no dispute as yet. The same considerations by which it was excluded from action in the latter instance will exclude it in the former.

If it should be contended that the Senate has a right to join in the electoral count, as representing the several States, I reply that the idea of State autonomy is guarded in a much more effective manner by the requirement of the Constitution that whenever the House of Representatives proceeds to an election of the President, the votes are to be taken by States, the Representatives of each State having but one vote, and a majority of all the States being necessary to a choice.

So, as respects the suggestion that if the House of Representatives have an exclusive jurisdiction over the electoral vote for President, it will be tempted to abuse that jurisdiction, I reply that such a suggestion presupposes a revolutionary proceeding, and from that possibility not even the joint system of Senate and House is exempt. Indeed, where revolution is resorted to there are no muniments in either branch of the Government, legislative, executive, or judicial, which might not be overthrown. That assuredly is a remote contingency, in which the popular branch of the Government will be likely to betray its own constituency, and by fraud or treachery subvert the popular will.

Having thus presented, though with far too little deliberation and method, my views upon this important subject, I beg to say that your considerate perusal of these pages will afford me the highest honor; and for the rest I leave them and the views they sustain to the test of that supremest of all known vindicators of the truth—the conflict of ideas.

Very respectfully, yours,

RICHARD S. SPOFFORD.

Mr. EATON. A word or two more. I said there was no precedent. Let us make one now. Because there had never been until 1876 any necessity for joint action, and therefore it had never been urged, I urge it now. I say it is a fair construction of the Constitution. If the House or Senate have not the power, every one will agree Congress has, and it should determine in joint convention. It is not a violent construction of the Constitution. It is new, it is novel, and therefore men look upon it as something strange. Well said Alexander H. Stephens, when speaking of it, it had the merit of fairness and justice and necessity.

Upon my word, Mr. Speaker, I can not see any good reason why the House and the Senate should not meet together and determine this question. No matter whether I think they have full power or not, I give away my convictions. I trample under foot my opinions and the opinions of Charles O'Connor, of Jeremiah Black, of Matt Carpenter, of Bancroft, and a hundred other gentlemen for the purpose of securing a measure that will act properly, produce harmony, and do justice to all the people of this country. There could not be another electoral commission.

Mr. BROADHEAD (from his seat). There ought not to be.

Mr. EATON. And my friend says there ought not to be. Mr. Speaker, there never will be. This country would not submit to another. This country could not stand the strain of another electoral commission, and it will not stand the strain of having legitimate and proper votes cast out because there is not a concurrent vote of the two Houses. New York would not suffer herself to be thus outraged.

Mr. PETERS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a single question just here?

Mr. EATON. Well, I have but a moment longer.

Mr. PETERS. I merely wish to ask the gentleman if he does not think it would be better that the vote of Connecticut should not be counted at all than that a fraudulent vote or return should be received and counted.

Mr. EATON. I do not know anything about it. That is a question he ought not to put to me. He has no business to assume that anybody will count the fraudulent vote of Connecticut—no business to assume it at all. I do not propose to do it, nor to count the fraudulent vote of Kansas, or of Missouri, or New York. But to undertake to say that the thirty-six votes of New York should not be counted, what would be the result? Why, everybody knows that it would be revolution. Everybody knows that this country would not stand that strain again, and it won't do to get up bugaboo stories either that the artillery of the people is to be leveled against the representatives of the people. That won't work twice.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Connecticut allow me to remind him——

Mr. EATON. I would greatly prefer in the few moments that I have not to be interrupted.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I want to say to him that I hope he will not forget in that connection the "hundred thousand unarmed Kentuckians" that Henry Watterson was going to bring on here to attend that count.

Mr. EATON. My friend will be here, I trust, an unarmed or armed Kentuckian, to do justice, as I believe he will in this matter; because I believe that he prefers the bill of the House to the bill of the Senate, and that bill proposes to do even-handed justice to all; nothing more, nothing less.

And now but a word further. Is it not better, taking into consideration the terrible emergency through which we passed eight years ago—is it not better, I say, that we should pass some bill than to go without law and rest merely upon the Constitution?

Mr. HORR. Why not take the Senate bill, then?

Mr. EATON. Why not take the Senate bill! It is rotten from head to heel. There is not a constitutional hair in its head, nor a constitutional corn on any one of its toes. [Laughter.] It is rotten all over, and is not worthy the attention of this House for one moment, not a moment.

I ask the House of Representatives to pass the bill of the committee. Let us take it to the Senate and hope that the Senate will agree with us. If that body shall fail us, then I should hope that a conference committee might get up something satisfactory to all, and so would my friend from Michigan. I should hope that some law might be agreed upon so that these 55,000,000 of people that inhabit this broad land would not be thrown into revolution and anarchy. The bill may be wrong. I do not think it is quite right myself; I do not pretend to think so; some gentlemen do; but it is a great deal better than no law at all. It is a great deal better than the Senate bill, in my judgment, and therefore I ask its favorable consideration at the hands of this House, and I can not do better than to reiterate what I said before, that if it should pass this House and should fail to pass the other branch of the Federal Legislature, I should pray that some bill might be agreed upon in conference that would not be seriously obnoxious to either branch of the Federal Legislature. We all desire the proper thing. We all desire peace and harmony. We do not desire to see this people cast into the throes of a revolution, none of us. And so then, Mr. Speaker, without having time to go thoroughly into a discussion of this matter, I ask the representatives of the people here to support the bill of their committee.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama to the Senate bill.

Mr. EATON. In order to perfect the House bill I should be glad to offer a mere verbal amendment.

The SPEAKER. It can be done by unanimous consent. The substitute is considered as before the House. Does the gentleman desire to offer an amendment at this time?

Mr. EATON. I want to offer this amendment, to add a new section, to be section 4 of the bill, in the following words:

That sections 135 and 142 of the Revised Statutes are hereby repealed.

These are the statutes relating to the time of holding the electoral meeting. They are changed by the bill, and that is all the amendment I propose to offer. Let this be section 4 of the bill, and section 4 of the bill be numbered section 5.

Mr. BROADHEAD. I presume the amendment is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. BLAND. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague from Missouri [Mr. BROADHEAD] be allowed five minutes for debate.

Mr. EATON. Then in that case I should like to have five minutes in reply. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!" and "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, which is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. BLAND. I hope the objection will be withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri that his colleague be allowed five minutes?

Objection was made.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] to the Senate bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 2 of the Senate bill by inserting, in line 8, between the words "shall be" and the word "conclusive," the words "unless overruled by the concurrent action of the Senate and the House of Representatives;" so that it will read:

"Every such determination made pursuant to such law so existing on said day, and made at least six days prior to the said time of meeting of the electors, shall be, unless overruled by the concurrent action of the Senate and the House of Representatives, conclusive evidence of the lawful title to office of the electors who shall have been so determined to have been appointed, and shall govern in the counting of the electoral votes as provided in the Constitution and as hereinafter regulated."

Mr. EATON. Is that amendment now in order? Is it not the substitute that is before the House?

The SPEAKER. The original text must first be perfected.

The amendment proposed by Mr. HERBERT was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is next on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] to the substitute, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as section 4: "That sections 135 and 142 of the Revised Statutes are hereby repealed."

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I suppose the change repeals those sections by implication anyway.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The next amendment to the substitute is that proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EVERHART], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 3 of the substitute, after the word "vote," in the fourth line, insert "the House of Representatives voting by States, each State having two votes, and the Senate voting per capita;" so that it shall read:

"And the joint convention shall then proceed to vote, the House voting by States, each State having two votes, and the Senate voting per capita."

The question being taken, there were—ayes 30, noes 82.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment, that offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS].

Mr. PETERS. I should like to have my amendments all read together in order that they may be understood.

The Clerk read as follows:

First amendment: In line 1 of section 3, after the word "Congress," insert "and the Supreme Court of the United States." In line 3 of section 3, at the commencement of the line, insert "the Supreme Court of the United States."

Second amendment: In line 1 of section 4, on page 9, strike out the figure "4" and insert "5." In line 4, after the word "left," insert "the members of the Supreme Court in the body of the Hall, on the left of the presiding officer."

Third amendment: In line 40, on page 8, strike out all of section 3 after the word "Senate" and insert the following: "Then those votes, and those only, shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall concurrently decide to be the lawful votes of the legally appointed electors of such State. When the two Houses have voted, they shall immediately again meet, and the presiding officer shall then announce the decision of the question submitted. When the two Houses separate to decide upon an objection that may have been made to the counting of any electoral vote or votes from any State, or other question arising in the matter, each Senator and Representative may speak to such objection or question five minutes, and not more than once; but after such debate shall have lasted two hours it shall be the duty of the presiding officer of each House to put the main question without further debate."

Fourth amendment: Add the following as an additional section, to be numbered section 4: "In case of a disagreement between the two Houses upon any question submitted to them separately as hereinbefore provided, then a committee of conference of like number and in like manner as in a disagreement upon any legislation shall be appointed, which committee shall forthwith meet and after a session of not more than two hours shall report the result of their conference to the respective Houses. Should the two Houses fail to agree upon the disputed question the committee of conference shall again meet and shall forthwith present the disputed question to the Supreme Court of the United States, who, after one hour's argument on the part of the Senate and one hour's argument on the part of the House, shall forthwith decide the question presented, and such decision shall be binding upon the Senate and the House of Representatives."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas desire separate votes on all these amendments?

Mr. PETERS. No, sir. I think they ought all go together.

The question being taken on the amendments, they were not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 5377) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CAMERON of Wisconsin, Mr. MANDERSON, and Mr. GEORGE as conferees on the part of the Senate.

ELECTORAL COUNT.

The SPEAKER. The question is next on the adoption of the amendment reported by the committee as amended as a substitute for the Senate bill.

Mr. PARKER. I now ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BROADHEAD] be allowed five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BROADHEAD] be allowed five minutes for debate.

Objection was made by several members.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the committee as a substitute for the Senate bill.

Mr. BROADHEAD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 46 members voting therefor.

Mr. POLAND. I hope we shall be allowed to finish this bill before we take a recess. I ask unanimous consent that the time for taking a recess be extended until the consideration of this bill be concluded.

Mr. WOLFORD. I object.

Mr. TUCKER. I suggest that the time for the recess be at least extended until the vote by yeas and nays has been taken on the substitute.

The SPEAKER. The roll-call will not be interrupted by the arrival of 5 o'clock.

Mr. BROADHEAD. I understand the question now is on the adoption of the amendment reported by the committee as a substitute for the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. It is.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 127, nays 82, not voting 114; as follows:

So the substitute was agreed to.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. WADSWORTH with Mr. COLLINS.

Mr. BURNES with Mr. STEWART, of Vermont, for this day.

Mr. DEUSTER with Mr. JOHNSON, for this day.

Mr. COOK with Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. If present, Mr. COOK would vote for the substitute and against the Senate bill, and Mr. HENDERSON would vote for the Senate bill and against the substitute.

Mr. YOUNG with Mr. PAYNE, until further notice.

Mr. THROCKMORTON with Mr. PEEL, on this bill.

Mr. FINDLAY with Mr. GEORGE, on this bill. Mr. FINDLAY would vote for the House bill, and Mr. GEORGE for the Senate bill.

Mr. VANCE with Mr. MCCOMAS, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. OATES with Mr. STRAIT, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I have voted against the substitute. As I am announced as paired with Mr. VANCE for the remainder of the day, I withdraw my vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. EATON moved to reconsider the vote by which the substitute was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HART. I ask unanimous consent that the time for taking a recess be extended until the vote can be taken upon the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair submitted that request some time since, but objection was made.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If there is to be no yea-and-nay vote I think there will be no objection.

Mr. HART. No yeas and nays will be called for.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is asked that the time for taking the recess be postponed until the vote is taken upon the passage of the pending bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill as amended was then ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. EATON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, pursuant to the previous order (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.), the House took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., and was called to order by Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, as Speaker pro tempore.

The Clerk read the following:

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK, Clerk House of Representatives:

Hon. WILLIAM H. HATCH is designated as Speaker pro tempore for this evening's session.

J. G. CARLISLE,
Speaker House of Representatives.

JUNE 24, 1884.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now read the order of business for this evening session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House shall take a recess at 5 o'clock this evening to reassemble at 8 o'clock p. m. for the sole purpose of considering bills from the Committee on Military Affairs and Senate bills on the Speaker's table, the subject-matter of which has been considered by the Committee on Military Affairs.

SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNTS OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 5890 to provide for the settlement of accounts of officers of the Army who served during the war of the rebellion, and that the same be now considered in the House.

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever the accounting officers of the Treasury have failed to finally close the accounts of officers of the Army for moneys paid out and properly issued or expended in the military service of the United States during the war of the rebellion, for want of vouchers of due and proper form, said accounting officers are hereby authorized and directed to receive the affidavits of the officers concerned, and such other corroborative and secondary evidence as can be reasonably procured, that the moneys and property for which they remain responsible on the books of the Treasury Department were honestly paid out in the public service, and thereupon to credit said officers for the same and close their accounts.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROSECRANS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RETIRED-LIST FOR PRIVATES, ETC., OF THE ARMY.

Mr. LYMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5670) to authorized a retired-list for privates and non-commissioned officers of the United States Army who have served for a period of thirty years or upward, and that the same be now considered in the House.

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That when an enlisted man has served as such thirty years in the United States Army, either as a private or as a non-commissioned officer, or both, he shall, by making application to the President, be placed on the retired-list hereby created, with the rank held by him at the date of retirement; and he shall thereafter receive 75 per cent. of the pay and allowances of the rank upon which he was retired.

Mr. LYMAN. I desire to move a verbal amendment to the bill. In line 4, after the words "United States Army," insert the words "or Marine Corps." I do this after consultation with some members of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LYMAN. The report is a brief one and will fully explain the bill. I ask that it be read.

The report (by Mr. LYMAN) was read, as follows:

Something is needed to give greater stability and a better standing to the enlisted man in our military service. If he could feel that he would have a proper provision for his old age he would be more likely to support the monotonous life of the service contentedly.

Were such a provision made, it would go far to make our military service an attractive one for respectable men, and in this way to get rid of the disreputable characters, who take the first opportunity to desert.

It is scarcely necessary to say that desertion is not only a great loss to the Government in men, money, and material, but it is the source of serious demoralization.

The annual desertions from our Army are between three and four thousand, and any measure that would lessen this number might well be considered an economical one; but beyond the question of economy stands that of justice. For it is no more than just that the soldier who has given all the best years of his life to the military service of the country should have some provision made for his old age beside the present Soldiers' Home, where he is separated from his family.

It is the opinion of the Lieutenant-General of the Army that thirty years would be the proper period of service to authorize the retirement of a private soldier or a non-commissioned officer. The passage of this bill would not entail much expense for the Government, because there are in the Army only fifty enlisted men who have served thirty years.

Your committee therefore advise the passage of the accompanying bill as a substitute for bill H. R. 1040.

The bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LYMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS FOR PROPERTY DESTROYED.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5713) to provide for the settlement of the claims of officers and enlisted men of the Army for loss of private property destroyed in the military service of the United States, and that the bill be now considered by the House.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was discharged from the further consideration of the bill; and the House proceeded to consider the same.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to examine into, ascertain, and determine the value of the private property belonging to officers, enlisted men, and duly authorized laundresses in the military service of the United States which has been, or may hereafter be, lost or destroyed in the military service, under the following circumstances:

First. When such loss or destruction was without fault or negligence on the part of the claimant.

Second. Where the private property so lost or destroyed was shipped on board an unseaworthy vessel by order of any officer authorized to give such order or direct such shipment.

Third. Where it appears that the loss or destruction of the private property of the claimant was in consequence of his having given his attention to the saving of the property belonging to the United States which was in danger at the same time and under similar circumstances. And the amount of such loss so ascertained and determined shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and shall be in full for all such loss or damage: Provided, That any claim which shall be presented and acted on under authority of this act shall be held as finally determined, and shall never thereafter be reopened or considered.

The following amendment, reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, was read and agreed to:

Add to the bill the following:

"And provided further, That this act shall not apply to losses sustained in time of war: And provided further, That the liability of the Government under this act shall be limited to such articles of personal property as the Secretary of War, in his discretion, shall decide to be reasonable."

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROSECRANS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RULES AND ARTICLES OF WAR.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I call up from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 5709) to amend article 72 of the Rules and Articles of War.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That article 72 of the Articles of War be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"ART. 72. Any general officer commanding the Army of the United States, a separate army, or a colonel commanding a separate department, shall be competent to appoint a general court-martial, either in time of peace or in time of war. But when any such commander is the accuser or prosecutor of any officer under his command the court shall be appointed by the President; and its proceedings and sentence shall be sent directly to the Secretary of War, by whom they shall be laid before the President, for his approval or orders in the case."

The following amendment, reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, was read and agreed to:

Amend the bill so as to make article 72 as amended read as follows:

"ART. 72. Any general officer commanding an army, or colonel commanding a separate department, may appoint general courts-martial whenever necessary. But when any such commander is the accuser or prosecutor of any officer under his command the court shall be appointed by the President; and its proceedings and sentence shall be sent directly to the Secretary of War, by whom they shall be laid before the President for his approval or orders in the case."

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROSECRANS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INSPECTOR-GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

Mr. LYMAN. I call up from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 1017) relative to the Inspector-General's Department of the Army.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Inspector-General's Department of the Army shall hereafter consist of one Inspector-General, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of brigadier-general; three inspectors-general with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonel; three inspectors-general with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant-colonel; and three inspectors-general with the rank, pay, and emoluments of major: Provided, That the offices restored to the Inspector-General's Department or added thereto, by this act, shall be filled by the promotion of the officers now in that department; and that thereafter appointments to fill vacancies in the Inspector-General's Department, and promotions therein, shall be made in conformity with sections 1129, 1193, and 1204 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and in the same manner as in the other staff departments of the Army. And all laws or parts of laws conflicting with this act are hereby repealed.

The following amendment, reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, was read and agreed to.

In lines 5, 6, and 8, strike out "three" before inspector-general, and insert "two."

Mr. LYMAN. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. CUTCHEON and others. That is unnecessary.

Mr. WELLER. I ask to have the report read.

The report (by Mr. LYMAN) was read, as follows:

From the original organization of our Army the inspectors-general have been held to be officers of great importance and proper to be clothed with high rank. From 1827 to the time of the Mexican war, when the Army did not exceed 8,000 men, and the country to be covered scarcely extended beyond the Mississippi River on the west, there were two colonels as inspectors-general; and the same number was maintained from the Mexican war until 1861, during which time the force was increased to about 12,000 officers and men.

In 1861, before the outbreak of the rebellion, there were three colonels serving as inspectors-general In 1874 the department, decreased of course from the great establishment of the war of the rebellion, still consisted of five colonels, one lieutenant-colonel, and two majors, supplemented by several officers of the line detailed as assistants. In that year a bill was proposed having for its object the reduction of the staff of the Army. As finally passed, on June 23 of that year, it reduced no portion of the staff except the Inspector-General's Department, wherein the five colonels were reduced to one.

Under this act the inspectors-general consisted of one colonel, two lieutenant-colonels, and two majors. The additional officers needed were detailed from the line. By subsequent legislation the senior inspector-general was made a brigadier, so that the department now consists legally of one brigadier-general, two lieutenant-colonels, and two majors. The amount of work now required of inspectors-general is very much greater than in 1861, before the rebellion, owing not only to the twofold increase in the number of troops, but the immense sums paid out by the disbursing departments, all of which must be supervised by inspectors-general. The accounts are inspected four times a year; and the amount thus examined and verified for the year 1882 was nearly $59,000,000. It is only since April, 1864, that this supervision of disbursements has been required of the department.

In addition to the increased labor above referred to, the inspection duties have been augmented by reason of the larger territory occupied by troops and disbursing officers, a territory no longer limited by the Mississippi River, but stretching from ocean to ocean.

As at present organized, there are fourteen officers employed as inspectors-general, of whom only five, to wit, one general, one colonel, two lieutenant-colonels, and one major, are permanent, while nine, to wit, two lieutenant-colonels, four majors, two captains, and one lieutenant, are detailed from the line.

It is evident that the duties are now so varied and important as to be best performed by permanent officers, whose growing experience may render their services constantly more valuable. An officer detailed from the line needs a certain time to learn his novel duties, and while he is thus employed his regiment is deprived of the services which would be of value to it. The injury inflicted on regiments of volunteers during the rebellion by the large details of officers for staff duty and of enlisted men to the Quartermaster, Commissary, and Medical Departments is notorious.

Economical and efficient service can best be attained through officers carefully selected and permanently employed in duties which demand a special capacity. Such special capacity is certainly needed in performing the duties, as at present defined, of inspector-general. These officers should not only be chosen with care, but should have conferred on them sufficient rank to give dignity to their office. They are often ordered to investigate and report upon the administration of officers of high rank, who, as is natural, would submit with very bad grace to the inspection of an officer much lower in rank than themselves. For a like reason an officer commanding troops always refuses to parade his command for inspection in person when the inspector is his inferior in rank. In one word, the inspection of officers of high rank by those far below them is liable to be accompanied by circumstances which may prejudice good order and military discipline.

In consideration of the former constitution of the Inspector-General's Department, and of the recommendations of the Inspector-General, and in view of the arguments set forth in this report, your committee is of opinion that the Inspector-General's Department should consist of one brigadier-general, two colonels, two lieutenant-colonels, and six majors.

If the inspectors-general are officers of sufficient rank, carefully selected and retained permanently for their special duty, it is believed that eleven officers, with an aggregate annual pay of $33,500, could properly perform the duties now assigned to fourteen officers with an aggregate annual pay of $39,100, thus making a saving of $5,600.

House bill 1017, as amended, provides that the reconstructed department should be composed of officers now serving in that department. These would comprise the five officers now permanently attached, and, in addition, six more officers to be selected from those now detailed as inspectors-general from the line.

The bill further provides that all vacancies in the grade of major in the Inspector-General's Department shall be filled by selections from captains in the line; that the senior inspector-general shall be appointed by selection from officers in his department, and that all other promotions shall be by seniority in the corps.

The committee therefore recommend that House bill 1017 be amended as follows: By striking out in the fifth line the word "three" and inserting in its place the word "two;" by striking out in the sixth line the word "three" and inserting in its place the word "two;" and by striking out in the eighth line the word "three" and inserting in its place the word "six," and that it pass as thus amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LYMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROMOTIONS IN JUDGE-ADVOCATES' CORPS.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I now call up from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 838) to consolidate the Bureau of Military Justice and the corps of judge-advocates of the Army, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Bureau of Military Justice and the corps of judge-advocates of the Army be, and the same are hereby, consolidated under the title of Judge-Advocate-General's department; and shall consist of one Judge-Advocate-General, with the rank, pay, and allowances of a brigadier-general; one assistant judge-advocate-general, with the rank, pay, and allowances of a colonel; two deputy judge-advocate-generals, with the rank, pay, and allowances of lieutenant-colonels; and four judge-advocates, with the rank, pay, and allowances of majors; the colonel and lieutenant-colonels to be selected by seniority from the present corps of judge-advocates. And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to detail such number of officers of the line as he may deem necessary to serve as acting judge-advocates of military departments, who shall have while on such duty the rank, pay, and allowances of captains of cavalry.

SEC. 2. Promotions in the Judge-Advocate-General's department, as provided in the first section of this act, shall be by seniority up to and including the rank of colonel.

SEC. 3. That nothing herein shall be construed to interfere with the rank or position of any officer now holding a commission in either the Bureau of Military Justice or corps of judge-advocates.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I move to amend by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That in view of the absence of all promotion in the corps of judge-advocates of the Army, whenever any officer of said corps shall have served fifteen years' continuous service as major he shall be promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and when he shall have served thirty years he shall be promoted to the rank of colonel; but such promotion shall not authorize an appointment to fill any vacancy when such appointment would increase the whole number of officers in the corps beyond the number fixed by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROSECRANS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I move that the title of the bill just passed be amended so as to read: "A bill to provide promotion in the corps of judge-advocates."

The amendment was agreed to.

BRANCH HOME FOR DISABLED SOLDIERS.

Mr. LAIRD. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4696) to authorize the location of a branch home for disabled volunteer soldiers in either the State of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska; and that the House proceed to the consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The bill was read, as follows, with the amendments reported by the committee:

Be it enacted, &c., That the board of managers of the Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers are hereby authorized and directed to locate a branch of the home at some suitable point in either the State of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska; and that the same shall not be located on a tract of land less than three hundred and twenty acres in extent.

SEC. 2. That said branch home shall be located and the ground purchased by said board of managers unless the same be given within three months, or as soon thereafter as practicable, from the approval of this act.

SEC. 3. That within six months, or as soon thereafter as practicable, from the approval of this act, the said board of managers shall commence the erection of a suitable building or buildings on the grounds so purchased for the use of the said branch home; that said building or buildings shall be completed at as early a day as practicable.

SEC. 4. That the sum of $250,000 is hereby appropriated for the purposes hereintofore mentioned and the improvements of the grounds of said branch home.

SEC. 5. That all honorably discharged soldiers and sailors who served in the war of the rebellion or any other war in which the United States has been engaged, who are disabled by age, disease, or otherwise, and by reason of such disability are incapable of earning a living, shall be admitted into the home for disabled volunteer soldiers.

Mr. COSGROVE. I would like to ask the gentleman who has charge of the bill how this home is to be located?

Mr. LAIRD. It is to be located by the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Home.

Mr. COSGROVE. It appears that they are not confined to any particular State, but may locate this home either in Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska.

Mr. LAIRD. Yes, sir.

Mr. COSGROVE. Those are the only States? [Laughter.]

Mr. LAIRD. Yes, sir. The board of managers is authorized to locate this institution in any of the States named in the bill.

Mr. COSGROVE. I think I must move to amend by striking out "Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, and Nebraska." [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Does the gentleman want to leave Missouri alone?

Mr. PUSEY. I move to lay the House bill upon the table, and in lieu of it to take up for action at this time the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the House bill will be laid upon the table; and there being no objection, the bill (S. 1404) to authorize the location of a branch home for volunteer disabled soldiers in either of the States of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska, and for other purposes, will be taken up for consideration.

There was no objection; and the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Is it similar to the House bill?

Mr. ROSECRANS. It is. I understand identical.

Mr. MAGINNIS. In order to see whether it is or not, let it be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

An act (S. 1404) to authorize the location of a branch home for volunteer disabled soldiers in either of the States of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That the board of managers of the Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers are hereby authorized and directed to locate a branch of the home at some suitable point in either the States of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska. The same shall not be located on a tract of land less than three hundred and twenty acres in extent.

SEC. 2. That said branch home shall be located and the ground purchased by said board of managers within three months, or as soon thereafter as practicable, from the approval of this act: Provided, That said board of managers may select any Government property suitable for such home, by and with the consent of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 3. That within six months, or as soon thereafter as practicable, from the approval of this act, the said board of managers shall commence the erection of a suitable building or buildings on the ground so purchased for the use of said branch home. That said building or buildings shall be completed at as early a day as possible.

SEC. 4. That the sum of $250,000 is hereby appropriated for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned and the improvement of the grounds of said branch home.

SEC. 5. That all honorably discharged soldiers and sailors who served in the war of the rebellion, who are disabled by age, disease, or otherwise, and by reason of such disability are incapable of earning a living, shall be admitted into the home for disabled volunteer soldiers.

SEC. 6. That the board of managers of the Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers is hereby authorized to inquire into the expediency of establishing a branch of the home in the State of California for the Pacific coast, and to that end the said board is authorized to receive propositions from the managers of the "veterans' home," located in Napa County, California, for the transfer of the buildings, grounds, and property of said "veterans' home" to the United States, for use as a branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and to report to Congress in respect to the propriety and expediency of accepting said "veterans' home" for such branch; but this section shall not interfere with the establishing of the home provided for in this act. And also that the board of managers of the Soldiers' Home be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a branch soldiers' home in the State of Michigan, and also as to the use of the Fort Dearborn military reservation, and the building thereon for that purpose, and to report to Congress thereon at an early day; but this provision shall not interfere with the establishment of the home provided for in this act.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I call the attention of the House to the fact that there is an omission in the Senate bill, as it does not provide "for other wars of the United States."

Mr. ROSECRANS. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the bill just read that I see it has additional provisions to those contained in the House bill. I am glad to see them there. I do not propose to take up the time of the House by discussing those additional provisions, but I will say a word in regard to the ambiguity we left in the other bill regarding the erection of the soldiers' home west of the Mississippi. Our purpose in leaving that unsettled was that we might have the best judgment and the best information that could be procured through the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

We were particularly attracted by the statement made by the president of the board of managers to the committee that an increasing number of rheumatic and disabled soldiers were continually calling for a milder climate and more favorably conditions; and inasmuch as the existing homes were already substantially crowded, and according to their opinion likely to be more crowded by a percentage of increase for several years, to wit, some eleven or twelve years according to their estimate, we thought that this Western home would be an outlet, first, to provide for that large body of soldiers who were going West into a new country and who failed by breaking down in life, and that it would also be an outlet for such veterans of other homes who could not well endure the sharp climate where the present four homes are. We therefore left it so it might be located wherever the board of managers might think proper, either in Kansas or one of the other States mentioned, instead of specifying any particular State.

Mr. COSGROVE. This bill, I understand, provides for the erection of a home absolutely in the State of California and one in Michigan.

A MEMBER. No.

Mr. COSGROVE. Yes; it does. It provides for three, if not four, and I presume that each one will cost $250,000. As to these soldiers who may be required to go to these homes, I think, as a matter of humanity, it would be better to give them the money, if it is to be appropriated right out, than to establish these homes in this way.

A MEMBER. That is it.

Mr. COSGROVE. If I correctly recollect the reading of the bill it provides absolutely for one in the State of California. One may be located in Arkansas, Missouri, Kansas, or Iowa. Another must be located in Michigan and another in Minnesota. I am opposed to the bill.

Mr. MAGINNIS. If my friend will have that portion of the bill read again he will see it only requires that report shall be made to Congress as to the possibility of a home in Michigan or California.

Mr. COSGROVE. I do not understand that to be the opinion in regard to the home in California. I am opposed to the bill anyway.

The bill was again read.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I move in the fifth section, after the word "rebellion," to insert "or in other wars in which the United States has been engaged."

Mr. MAGINNIS. That makes the bill conform to the report of the Military Committee.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I would like to know from the chairman of the committee or any other gentleman whether the same provisions obtain as to the other soldier homes in the country, or whether this is an innovation? If it is an innovation, I am opposed to it and would favor some general statute applying to all.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I will state in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Iowa that since the passage of the first law creating homes for disabled volunteer soldiers some thirteen or fourteen acts have been passed enlarging the privileges and extending them to a larger number of persons than was at first contemplated, and at present the summing up all of these laws amounts to the provision as set forth in this bill.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I understand that to be in substance the report of the House committee which reported the original bill corresponding to this now before the House, which is the Senate bill. It simply enables all soldiers to stand upon an equal footing.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. That amendment would take in the soldiers of the Indian wars as well?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. MAGINNIS. It ought to take in any soldier who fought under any flag for the Constitution, the laws, and the glory of the United States.

The amendment proposed by Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, was agreed to.

Mr. CRISP. Is it in order to call for the reading of the report accompanying this bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Georgia that we are now considering a Senate bill, and there is no report with the Senate bill.

Mr. CRISP. Then may I call upon the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to state some reason for passing this bill at all?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Committee on Military Affairs reported a bill upon the subject, and by unanimous consent of the House the Senate bill was taken up in place of the House bill, which Senate bill is now under consideration.

Mr. CRISP. Well, Mr. Speaker, in the absence of anything in the shape of a reason given for the establishment of this home I am opposed to it. No gentleman has given any reason whatever, and when I ask for the reading of the report I am informed that there is none.

Mr. ROSECRANS. In response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Georgia, I will state what I said before, that the House committee made a long and full report recommending the bill upon this subject, which report contained probably all of the information he desired. But in consequence of the unanimous consent which has been given to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill, and nobody having called for the House report, no report has been read. I am sure, however, if the gentleman desires to have the report accompanying the House bill read it will answer fully all of his inquiries upon this subject.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I presume there will be no objection to having the House report read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that any gentleman can have the report read as a part of his remarks.

Mr. CRISP. Then I will ask to have that report read as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LAIRD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report:

The records of the War Department show the enrollment of 2,859,132 volunteer soldiers during the rebellion, 2,320,272 of which were three-years' men. Of this number 284,037 were from the States and Territories west of the Mississippi River.

The estimates of the Pension Department show that of the total number of soldiers raised 1,200,000 are now living. Of these 846,811 live east and 353,189 west of the Mississippi.

There are four homes for volunteer soldiers, all of which are located east of the Mississippi, namely, Dayton, Ohio; Milwaukee, Wis.; Augusta, Me., and Hampton, Va.

There is one home for soldiers of the regular Army alone, located at Washington, D. C. The capacity of this home is estimated at five hundred persons, which is the number of its inmates.

The following table shows what was done by the several volunteer homes during the year ending June 30, 1883:

Homes.	Number of inmates, 1883.
	Average.	Highest at any one time.	Total aided or cared for.
Dayton	3,946	4,015	9,481
Milwaukee	848	Not given.	1,796
Augusta	1,045	Not given.	1,896
Hampton	953	1,003	1,530
Total	6,792	5,018	14,704

While your committee have not been able to learn the capacity of these homes to a man, it appears that two of them are now filled beyond their capacity, and that the others will be before new homes can be provided.

The following extracts from the reports of the governors of the three principal homes will show the condition of the several institutions named on the 30th of June, 1883:

[From the report of Governor Patrick, of the Dayton (Ohio) Home.]

"During the last winter the number of our members 'present' rose to 4,015—the highest number ever reached—making it necessary for large numbers of men to sleep on the floors, and crowding the barracks much beyond their capacity, interfering with both ventilation and comfort. From present indications we shall be still more crowded in time to come. Judging from past experience, especially of the last three years, the ratio of increase in numbers will continue to grow for some years to come; and the question constantly before us is, How shall the demand be met? Already we have been crowded to the utmost of our capacity, as I have already stated. By far the largest proportion of those who now apply for admission are well advanced in years, many of them requiring hospital accommodations from the time they enter the home. Many of those who have hitherto taken care of themselves with a little aid from others are now compelled to apply for admission; others still, who have been more largely dependent upon their families, find their families breaking up by death or otherwise and seek a refuge here. Their claims can not be ignored, but how can they be met?"

[From the report of Governor Woodfin, of the Hampton (Va.) Home.]

"We could hardly have accommodated our numbers except for the addition and alterations to main building giving us more room, but as admissions are coming in it is evident that very shortly the example of the Central branch must be followed here and further applications denied, unless additional quarters be provided. Hospital accommodation is much needed, as the present buildings are inadequate, old, and inconvenient.

[From the report of Governor Stephenson, of the Augusta (Me.) Home.]

"It is evident, however, that the applicants for admission during the coming year are to be very numerous, overtaxing the accommodations that can be provided. As a general rule the new applicants are of a better class of men—veterans who have struggled to support themselves in spite of wounds and disease, until increased age compels them to seek the national homes. The number of applications for furloughs is also decreasing, the men as they grow older evidently preferring to remain quiet and less inclined to seek change."

For the data referred to in this report touching existing volunteer homes, see report board of managers Soldiers' Home 1882 and 1883, Mis. Doc. No. 13, first session Forty-seventh Congress; Mis. Doc. No. 14, first session, Forty-eighth Congress.

While the homes herein named are called volunteer homes, regulars of any war are admitted to them as well as volunteers; but sailors of the war of the rebellion are not, unless they served in the Army as well as the Navy. Sailors of any other war than that of the rebellion are admitted.

There is no home provided for sailors of the late war, and no place where they can be cared for, unless they have served for twenty years, in which case they are eligible for admission to the naval asylum in Philadelphia.

No ex-soldiers, however helpless, under existing laws can be admitted to any home named unless he can trace his disability to an injury received or disease contracted in the line of duty.

The average number of soldiers to a home east of the Mississippi is 211,702; in this estimate the home in contemplation at Erie, Pa., is not included. The number of soldiers west of that river to no home is 353,189.

The ratio of inmates of a home in the territory east of the Mississippi to those who are not is 1 to every 138. The ratio in the West is 1 to 531.

East the ratio of total number cared for at all the soldiers' homes to those not cared for is 1 to 57. West the comparison can not be made, as it is not shown that any are cared for save such as are inmates.

The number of inmates of existing homes from States and Territories west of the Mississippi is 665. They are distributed as follows:

Arkansas	1	Nebraska	8
California	42	New Mexico	1
Colorado	4	Oregon	4
Iowa	206	Texas	1
Kansas	52	Utah	4
Louisiana	42	Washington Territory	5
Minnesota	44
Missouri	251	Total	665

The number of soldiers west of the Mississippi entitled to the benefit of homes, as shown by the ratio established in the East, between the disabled (i. e., inmates of homes) and those not, is 2,559; or, deducting the 665 from the West now cared for in the East, 1,894. The number of soldiers entitled to some care, as shown by the ratio found to exist east of the Mississippi, is 5,531.

There is another means of finding the number of soldiers in the West entitled to the benefits of the home more reliable than the ones so far adopted, namely, the relation of inmates to pensioners. An examination of the reports cited here shows that one out of every fifteen of the inmates of present homes are pensioners. January 1, 1884, there were 37,783 ex-soldiers west of the Mississippi on the pension-rolls, and 18,986 applications pending not acted on. We assume that one out of fifteen of this whole number, 56,769, or 3,784, less the number from the West, 665, now cared for in the East, 3,119, are now cared for by public or private charity, or are suffering for want of any care. This makes no account of the 5,531, who, if in the East, would receive some care or assistance from homes there. These estimates are based on the assumption that only those are to be cared for who are now eligible for admission to existing homes, and consequently fall far short of the actual number entitled to aid, unless the Government proposes to continue a policy which, in our judgment, owes its present existence only to the fact that the attention of Congress has not before been called to it. Assuming, however, that the present policy of caring for only such ex-soldiers as can trace their disability to wounds, or disease contracted in the line of duty in service, was intelligently adopted and has been intentionally adhered to, this bill brings the question of change of its policy squarely home to the Government, for it provides:

"SEC. 5. That all honorably discharged soldiers and sailors who served in the war of the rebellion, or in any other war in which the United States has been engaged, who are disabled by age, disease, or otherwise, and by reason of such disability are incapable of earning a living, shall be admitted into this home for disabled volunteer soldiers."

Your committee, after full consideration and examination of the subject, are unanimously agreed that the policy of caring for all as indicated in this bill is the true policy and ought to be adopted at once by this Government, and on this point they submit the recommendations of the board of managers of existing homes. In their report for the year ending June 30, 1882 (pp. 3 and 4, Mis. Doc. No. 14, first session Forty-seventh Congress), they say:

"In the last report of the board it was recommended that the benefits of the home be extended to destitute, deserving soldiers unable to earn their living, who could not trace their disabilities to their service, and that sailors who served the United States during the war of secession should be placed upon the same footing of admission to the home as are soldiers and sailors who served in preceding wars. Both propositions have been rejected by Congress, as we think, under a misapprehension; but in any event the persons included in these recommendations are in general as deserving of care by the General Government as are the present members of the home. Men are daily becoming prematurely disabled from disease, the seeds of which were sown in service, although when they were discharged they were able-bodied. The manager before whom such a case comes, if he act according to existing law, must refuse the man admission, and in general the applicant can only go to the nearest poor-house. If the manager admit the man, making a strained interpretation of the law on the side of humanity, the home, without further legislation, will soon overflow and admissions must cease.

"The case of disabled sailors requires only to be mentioned. Under existing law there is no place where a United States sailor disabled in the late war can be cared for, unless he had previously enlisted as a soldier."

Again, in their report for the year ending June 30, 1883 (pp. 3 and 26, Mis. Doc. No. 14, first session Forty-eighth Congress), they say:

"The board has on several occasions recommended legislation concerning the admission of destitute deserving soldiers whose disabilities can not be traced to their service, and the admission of sailors who served in the Navy during the civil war who are not now eligible to admission, although sailors who served in any other war are eligible. These recommendations, the board believes, deserve the attention of Congress, and they are respectfully reiterated.

"This failure to authorize the admission of disabled sailors is to be regretted, inasmuch as deserving men who served in the Navy are at this time wholly unprovided for unless they have served for twenty years, in which case they are eligible for admission to the Naval Asylum in Philadelphia."

Your committee have been unable to estimate the number of ex-soldiers or sailors that would be entitled to admission to homes on account of destitution and disability contracted since discharge.

It is obvious, however, that it will very largely increase the number now entitled to care, and that will compel a large increase of the capacity of existing homes and the building of additional ones. Whether the Government shall undertake the care of all destitute and disabled soldiers and sailors or not can make no difference with this bill, for there are from 1,894 to 3,119 disabled soldiers now living west of the Mississippi, and now entitled to care under existing laws, and suffering for the want of such care as those in the East are receiving, and have been since 1867. It is to be borne in mind that soldiers in the West now uncared for can not be cared for in the existing homes in the East at all. Those homes are now overcrowded by applicants from their own territory, and must at once be enlarged or relieved by this and other homes, or must close their doors and refuse shelter to those whose wounds guarantee them protection.

In this connection the following figures are of interest: The total number of new admissions to all the branches of the home for four years from 1876 to 1879, inclusive, was 6,020, and the total losses by death in the same time was 1,102, making a net gain of 4,918, being an average of 307 new admissions each year to each branch of the home The whole number of admissions for the four years from 1880 to 1883, inclusive, was 7,103. The number of deaths in the same time was 1,754, being a net gain of 5,349. A comparison of the aggregate of the series of years shows a decreased percentage of gains, but a further examination of the series of years from 1880 to 1883 shows that while the net gain for the year 1882 was but 1,282, that for 1883 was 1,703, or 25 per cent. more than that of 1882, indicating that the net increase of inmates of existing homes in the next four years will be from 800 to 1,000 more than the preceding four years, unless there shall be a change from present indications; and on that point we submit the following from the report of the board of managers for 1882:

"It is a mistake to suppose that there will soon be any material diminution of the number of members of the home. Many soldiers discharged for disability, without pensions as well as pensioners, who have hitherto supported themselves or lived with their families now grown up, begin to look to the home as the place where they wish to pass their declining years. They all, under the law, are eligible for admission, and such cases will arise for the next generation."

The judgment of the board, delivered in 1882, is more than confirmed by the increase of 1883.

Of the 353,189 ex-soldiers west of the Mississippi, it is estimated by certain members of the committee that fully two-thirds are located in the four States of Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, and Missouri, the major part of the balance being in Minnesota, Dakota, and California, the residue in Colorado, on the Pacific Slope, and in the South. The rosters of the States represented at the annual reunions of the veterans in the first four States named show that every loyal State is represented in these States by soldiers that enlisted from their home States and served through the war. As an evidence of the number of soldiers now in the State of Nebraska, at the last annual reunion held therein, at Hastings, at least one-half of the 40,000 people present were ex-soldiers.

Speaking of the character of the people who ask this relief, and the claims of the section in question, it can not be denied that both deserve well of the nation. The spirit of loyalty and enterprise that placed them among the foremost upon the battlefields of the war made them after its close the pioneers and founders of what may be called in numbers and extent a new nation, happily formed in the far West, without the pain of battle. They are a brave and loyal class. They have not lain supinely down and kissed the hand of national charity for a living; but as befitted their glorious teachings on the fields of death, they have laid hold of the engines of toil and used them to build an empire, where a score of years ago science proclaimed a desert. For nearly twenty years they have borne their share of the cost of maintaining the homes of the East that sheltered their brethren in arms, and made no sign. They were independent, for they could work.

Now that age and disease is beginning to overtake them and pull them down, we believe that the whole nation will give them gratefully, thankfully, the shelter they have doubly earned, and give it, too, without respect to whether they can trace their disabilities to wounds or disease contracted in the line of duty in the service. Knowing the character of those for whom it pleads, your committee prays that this, their home, may be placed conveniently in their midst, where they can be comforted and sustained in their failing years by the sight of family and friends, and where they may still watch with interest the growth of institutions and States they helped to found.

It is not thought by your committee that the admission or exclusion of sailors from this home will prove of much consequence as a fact, for there are very few, if any, such in the trans-Mississippi country; but as a matter of principle, as well as sentiment, the committee are of opinion that honorably discharged sailors ought to be treated as well as and no worse than soldiers; and it is gratifying to us to bear witness to the generosity of those who ask for this home in that they lead the way to justice long deferred by asking that their comrades of the Navy shall be admitted equally with themselves. There were 121,954 sailors enlisted during the war, exclusive of soldiers transferred to the Navy. Of this number 1,804 were killed and 3,266 wounded, a total casualty list of 5,070. When these facts are taken into account, and also the merit of the service rendered, and the extraordinary gallantry of those rendering it, it is matter of wonder that their claim to recognition has slumbered for twenty years, and only now been awakened by men who are strangers to them.

The introduction of the bill in question was asked in accordance with a resolution offered and unanimously adopted by the National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, held at Denver, Colo., in July, 1883, by authority of which resolution a committee of five members of that organization was appointed to represent to the next Congress of the United States the necessity and justice of establishing a soldiers' home west of the Mississippi. As the views of that organization are set forth in the forcible and eloquent memorial referred to this committee, we attach the same hereto, marked Exhibit A, and make it a part of this report.

Your committee recommend that the bill be amended as follows: In line 2, section 2, after the word "managers," insert "unless the same be given." In line 6, section 3, strike out the word "possible" and insert in lieu thereof the word "practicable." In line 2, section 5, insert after the word "rebellion" the words "or in any other war in which the United States has been engaged." Amend the title of the bill by inserting after the word "soldiers" therein the words "and sailors."

And as so amended your committee recommend that the bill do pass.

EXHIBIT A.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

Your memorialists would respectfully state that the necessity for the establishment of a soldiers' home west of the Mississippi for disabled volunteer soldiers and sailors who served in the war of the rebellion, who by reason of old age, sickness, or otherwise are incapable of earning a living, is, we take it, an admitted fact. Recognizing this necessity, the seventeenth annual session of the National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Denver, Colo., July, 1883, on motion of a comrade from the State of Kansas, adopted a resolution "that a committee of five members of this encampment be appointed to present to the next Congress of the United States the necessity and justice of establishing a soldiers' home west of the Mississippi." In pursuance of said resolution, your memorialists were appointed such committee, and have prepared the accompanying bill.

This bill is not drawn in the interest of any locality, but alone in the interest of those whom it is intended to benefit in the great States of Arkansas, Colorado, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri, and Nebraska, having in their borders to-day more than 300,000 volunteer soldiers and sailors who served their country well in the war of the rebellion, many of whom, by reason of age or sickness, are unable to earn a living. Thus conditioned and in poverty they must find shelter, food, and raiment in a home provided as an act of justice, not charity, by the Government they fought to save, or become inmates of the poor-house, and through its windows look out upon the prosperity which without them would have been impossible to the Government which leaves them to starve or become the objects of common charity.

"I have been young," says the Psalmist, "and now am old; yet I have not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread." May this nation never become so old or forgetful of its duty as to permit one of the least of these, its veterans, to beg bread.

Your memorialists have only one object, and that is to secure the speedy erection of a commodious and suitable home at some convenient point in one of the States named in this bill. They have full faith and confidence in the Board of Managers of the Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and that their selection of a location under the bill will be a wise one.

Your memorialists trust that no member of Congress will antagonize this measure, which is just, as well as one of pressing necessity, because he may prefer to name the locality of the home in his district or State. This bill also provides for the admission into the home of all destitute honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the civil war, who by reason of age, sickness, or otherwise are rendered incapable of earning a living, whether their disabilities can be traced to their service or not. This is in accordance with the oft-repeated recommendations of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and, in their language, "deserve the attention of Congress." The homes now established are inadequate to meet the demands, and are far removed from the Territory named in this bill, and are so crowded that they could not receive our disabled comrades if sent to them.

No nation can afford to have millions of surplus revenue in its treasury and permit its veterans, who rendered that surplus revenue possible, to starve.

The justice, wisdom, and immediate necessity for the passage of this bill must be apparent to every member of Congress. These destitute soldiers need not words of praise and commendation—"words that are the children of the wind." Words grouped ever so eloquently do not warm the cold, clothe the naked, or feed the hungry. The disabled volunteer soldiers and sailors of the civil war deserve all and more than is asked in this bill. Let your appreciation of their services, when strong of body and brave and patriotic of spirit, be shown by your deeds—"deeds that are the daughters of the soul."

Your memorialists, in their personal intercourse with the members, have been kindly received and assured that their application will receive prompt attention. They believe that all that is necessary to secure the passage of this bill is to call your attention to its pressing necessity.

To this end your memorialists will ever pray.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word or two in regard to this bill.

Mr. LAIRD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment to make a suggestion?

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Certainly.

Mr. LAIRD. I understand that there is considerable opposition to the bill offered in lieu of the House bill; and to the end that these objections may be obviated as far as possible, it is agreed by the committee that we now ask unanimous consent to lay aside the Senate bill and proceed with the consideration of the House bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there any objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska to vacate the order of the House substituting the Senate bill for the House bill, and resume the consideration of the House bill, which was laid aside? This bill has already been read for the information of the House.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the reading of this report, and it has satisfied me better than I was satisfied before that the passage of this bill will not remove the difficulties suggested in the report. I am in favor of doing almost anything that can be done in the interest of the soldiers of this country. I think we can never do too much for them, and I stand second to no gentleman on this floor in my purpose to do anything that I think will be really in their interest. But I am not inclined to the opinion that there is any present demand for the home provided for in this bill, nor do I think that such a home as this is adequate to the present wants of dependent soldiers.

I recently had occasion to address a letter to the Secretary of War, making certain inquiries in regard to soldiers' homes, and asking him to furnish me with a statement showing the expense of supporting soldiers in the soldiers' homes in this country. I had looked into the reports and was not inclined to believe the statements I found there to be entirely correct. I was afraid to quote them until I made these inquiries. I thought that there must be some mistake in the figures. I consequently addressed a letter to the Secretary making these inquiries, and received from him the following answer:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., April 15, 1884.

SIR: In answer to your request of the 12th instant for a statement of the cost per year for the support of a soldier in a soldier's home, I have the honor to state the expenditures of the Soldiers' Home, District of Columbia, during the year ending September 30, 1883, were $125,609.43; the average number of soldiers therein was four hundred and sixty-two, and the average cost of support of each soldier was $271.88, which also includes the cost of buildings erected or repaired during the year and all other expenses.

In regard to the cost of maintenance of a soldier in the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, I must refer you to the annual report of the board of managers of said home, which is printed as House Miscellaneous Document No. 14, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, as these homes are not under the jurisdiction of this Department, the Secretary of War being only an ex officio member of the board of managers. From page 20 of that report, it appears that the "average cost of keeping each inmate, exclusive of clothing," is $483.11.

Very respectfully,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

Hon. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR,
House of Representatives.

I learned from this letter, as well as from the report to which he refers, that the cost of maintaining a soldier in a soldiers' home for disabled volunteer soldiers is $483.11 a year. This is the annual expense, the average cost, of each inmate. The National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers has several branches located in different parts of the country, and I am in favor of giving it a generous support. These homes are said to be well managed. They are under the control of distinguished men, and I take it that they are as well managed as they can be. And yet, after we have had twenty years of experience in managing soldiers' homes, this large expense seems unavoidable; and this expense of $483.11 a year is exclusive of clothing. The expense per capita of the inmates of the Soldiers' Home in the District of Columbia is not so much as the expense in the homes for volunteer soldiers, for reasons which are apparent to those who know how differently these homes are situated.

Mr. WELLER. I would be pleased to ask a question of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I do not care to yield. I do not want to be interrupted.

After twenty years of experience in the management of soldiers' homes we have ascertained the fact I have stated, that it costs $483.11 exclusive of clothing, to support a single inmate for a single year, in the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and this National Home includes all the volunteer homes, as they are all under one management and are considered as one home. This would support these soldiers in a first-class hotel in almost any part of this country. And yet the report shows, if it shows anything, that we would have to build a score of these soldiers' homes to accommodate the number of persons mentioned in this report as needing assistance. It would certainly require one in each State, and perhaps in some States two or three. This is on the supposition that there are as many persons needing help as is stated in this report.

There is a remedy, Mr. Speaker, and I am in favor of that remedy; and that is to pay this money to the soldiers. Give it to the disabled volunteers; pay it to them directly in the shape of a pension. Two hundred dollars a year paid directly to these soldiers would support them comfortably almost anywhere. It would feed and clothe them and supply all their wants, and supply them many luxuries and comforts which they never obtain in a soldiers' home; and we would then save to the Government $283.11 per soldier.

The time has come, Mr. Speaker, when we should make appropriations payable directly to the soldier. We must recognize the fact that there are thousands of soldiers in this country to-day who have never yet drawn a pension, who were brave and true soldiers, men who were at the front and in the thickest of the fight, men who never turned their back on their country's cause, men who followed the flag of their country through all the long, dark years of the war, and who are to-day in poverty and want, and when they applied for a pension they were refused because they could not furnish all the evidence required by the Department.

Only to-day I read a letter from a soldier who has a wife and three children and who has for years been trying to get a pension and is unable to get it because he can not show treatment for the disease while in the service. And he writes me that during that time he was a prisoner of war, in Andersonville or Libby Prison, and had no treatment. And yet he is required to make this proof in order to obtain a pension from this great and generous Government.

Mr. VALENTINE. I would suggest to the gentleman that that is all removed by the Senate amendment put on the Mexican pension bill passed by the Senate to-day.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I was going to come to that in a moment. I think the amendment made to the Mexican pension bill which passed the Senate to-day is a step in the right direction and will obviate the necessity for any more soldiers' homes. It will pay the money to every soldier who needs money. It will distribute the money to every honorably discharged soldier who is in want and who is not now drawing a pension. This bill as amended is the very thing that is needed. It provides for all disabled soldiers who have no means of support. These are the soldiers who appeal to the generosity of this country and to the magnanimity of this Government.

These men can not go to a soldiers' home. Many of them have wives and children. From boyhood to manhood, and frequently to old age, they have lived in the same familiar neighborhood. There they have their domicile. All their early and later associations and attachments cluster around their home, and many of them will die paupers before they will go away fifty or one hundred or two hundred miles to become the inmates of a soldiers' home. A soldiers' home to most volunteer soldiers seems like a prison or an infirmary. There is nothing homelike about it—no wife nor children, friends nor neighbors to make it cheerful or bright.

The homes are beautiful places to look at, and very attractive to those who are not compelled to stay there. You can surround them with all the poesy you please, but they lose much of this enchantment to the inmates. No soldiers' home is like the real home of the soldier. The place where the soldier desires to live is with his wife and children, if he has any, and most of them have. Then there is this fact which no one will question. The influences which surround a soldiers' home are often demoralizing. You can not go to one of these places without realizing this fact. Vicious habits are sometimes formed at these homes the influences of which sometimes follow the soldier to his home and family. Besides, Mr. Chairman, it is not in harmony with American ideas to herd together large numbers of men and abrogate the home which is sacred to the people of this country. And if you will examine the reports of these institutions you will discover that the largest number of the inmates are foreigners—men who have no homes or families, and hence, no local attachments. This way of living is distasteful to most Americans. I have had letters from soldiers who say they would rather go to the poor-house than to a soldiers' home, as in this event they would be near home and could get to see their wives and children.

And I have been surprised at another thing, and this report shows it. It shows the large number of persons who have been received into these soldiers' homes. The number is very large. Do you know the reason of this? It is because they constantly come and go, remain but a short time and the number of desertions is very large. Examine these reports and you will find that hundreds and perhaps thousands of soldiers who never deserted their country's flag, who never wavered in the face of an enemy—deserted these homes because they became so distasteful to them and because the regulations were objectionable. Read these reports and you will find how many men who were brave and true soldiers during the war, have deserted these soldiers' homes and have gone back home to live and die without the aid of the Government rather than receive its beneficence in this way.

Let us give the money to the soldiers. We owe it to them. We owe them a comfortable living. They need no guardian. We do not want to make soft places for Government appointees. If that is the object let us have more soldiers' homes. But if we have at heart the good of the soldier and the good of the soldier only, let us be generous toward every soldier that needs money and is without support. Every soldier that is disabled from any cause and is without means of support, every soldier who would have occasion to go to a soldiers' home let us pay him, and pay him liberally, instead of paying $100,000 for the purpose of benefiting the soldiers $25,000. You can readily see, Mr. Speaker, that it is time that we should change our system of supporting disabled soldiers. I can see no wisdom in appropriating money when only one-fourth of it ever reaches or benefits the soldier. If we mean to benefit the soldier let us do that directly. We can trust them with the money and should pay it to them directly, and in this way do them more good and save the Government a large and unnecessary expense.

I am very sure that not more than one-fourth of the amount of money appropriated for the support of these soldiers' homes ever reaches or benefits the soldier. Hence I do not now see why this bill should pass. I have not learned from this report any necessity for this increased expenditure. Indeed, I think the time has come for us to make the soldier his own guardian. Let him govern himself as a free man without having any superintendent or manager over him.

I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] for ten minutes, and will surrender the rest of my time.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I was not aware that this question was coming up to-night. I certainly am surprised at the presentation which has just been made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR]. It seems that we have five or more homes for disabled soldiers.

Mr. LAIRD. There are four of them.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. We have four homes for disabled soldiers in this country, all of them located east of the Mississippi River. The gentleman from Ohio who has just taken his seat [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] has in his own State, I believe, a comfortable home for soldiers. Now, when the region of country west of the Mississippi comes modestly to the doors of Congress asking for the establishment of a home for the benefit of the vast number of disabled soldiers now living in that region, we are suddenly informed that there must be a revolution in this system and startling developments are made before us.

Sir, we are not discussing this as an original proposition. This Government has passed that point already; the policy of establishing soldiers' homes has been settled. The only question now presented to us by this bill is: Shall we establish a home for disabled soldiers west of the Mississippi as well as for those east of the Mississippi? If I remember correctly the report which has been read to-night, one home alone which has been established has over 4,000 soldiers in it. From the data given in that able report of the committee it appears that there are only 1,900 soldiers west of the Mississippi out of the three hundred and fifty-odd thousand soldiers from that region who are eligible for admission into these homes.

Yet when we come here asking for the establishment of a home for that vast region, peopled as it is with disabled soldiers, not only from that portion of the country, but many of them who have moved from the East, we find a Representative from the State of Ohio, which State enjoys one of these homes, bringing forward some little objections to the policy inaugurated by this Government, and on those objections he seeks to deny us the benefit of a soldiers' home west of the Mississippi.

The gentleman says that it is expensive keeping these soldiers in these homes. The amount is greater than I supposed, some $480 a year each. But judging from the eloquent tribute which that gentleman paid to the soldiers of the Republic I suppose he would not stop at giving them that amount, but would be willing to give it into their own hands. It is not, therefore, the amount which troubles my friend from Ohio but the mode of placing it, whether through trustees or given directly to the soldiers. I will not be outdone by my friend in the matter of generosity to soldiers in the way of pensions. I believe in liberal pensions; I believe that justice should be done to the soldiers. And since it is only the manner and not the amount that troubles my friend, that point should be eliminated from this discussion.

We are told another thing, that there are evils in these homes. I am sorry to say, Mr. Speaker, that there are evils in all homes; even in that great citadel of virtue, the family home, we may find evils. I grant that in all organizations where man is housed by himself there is a tendency to evil. But human experience in every great nation has recognized the virtue of patriotism and the propriety of having homes for the disabled defenders of their country. I think we have passed the point to consider such trivial objections as these as a reason why we should not have another soldiers' home.

To sum up briefly, the facts are simply these: We have now four soldiers' homes established east of the Mississippi, while not one is established in that great Western paradise, the region west of the Mississippi. We come now for the first time modestly asking for our disabled soldiers that recognition which has been given to the soldiers in the Eastern States. I do not believe that any Representative east of the Mississippi River will cast his vote against us. I feel confident that no Representative from the South will cast his vote against us. And I know that no Representative from the vast plains west of the Mississippi River will be found casting his vote against us.

I do not talk for the sake of talking; but I say that unless this House is prepared to strike down this whole system, no argument has been advanced by my able friend from Ohio that will warrant any patriot here in voting against this home asked for by 2,000 disabled soldiers from the valley of the Mississippi now knocking at your doors.

Mr. LAIRD addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Chairman, is it in order to move amendments to the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska still holds the floor.

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Speaker, that the House may fully understand the amendment which I have just offered to this bill, I take the liberty of again reading the same:

Provided, That wherever a soldier has been an inmate of any one of the national soldiers' homes for a period of not less than twelve months, and shall have during that time a record of good behavior, it shall be optional with him to retire from said home and receive from the funds appropriated for the maintenance of the home of which he was a member $10 for every month he shall remain away from said home.

Mr. Speaker, the main object of the bill under consideration is to increase the number of soldiers' homes, so as to make possible the admission of fresh applicants and relieve the already overcrowded homes east of the Mississippi River. Sir, I think that by adopting this amendment these homes already existing can be relieved of many of their inmates with great satisfaction to the soldiers themselves and with profit to the Government. My friend from Ohio [Mr. MURRAY], who has given this matter his careful attention, tells me, and I know the same to be true myself, that there exists in the minds of these old veterans a dislike to be considered paupers and to be herded and housed and ruled in their declining years under the strict discipline of these homes.

Many of them leave their little families perforce to go into these institutions. Once again, as in the days of civil strife, the fondest and dearest ties of the human heart are cruelly severed, and the aged veteran, stabbed by his own patriotism, comes a mendicant to this Government institution often within its cold walls to but "crave a little earth for charity."

But from an economic standpoint there is a strong argument for this amendment. Leaving out interest and insurance and the like, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURRAY] informs me that the cost of maintenance per capita is about $11 per month. To keep strictly within bounds I have made the allowance only $10 per month. If allowance were made for cost of building, interest on investment, insurance, official salaries, and the like, the amount per capita would be very much larger. A great many inmates of these homes would undoubtedly take advantage of this amendment, and the Government, aside from dealing justly with these men, would save, in addition to all other things, the expense of building these new homes in the West. Do gentlemen want to increase Government institutions and the roster of officials drawing salaries from the Federal Treasury? Defeat this amendment, and you show just how deeply your much vaunted love for the soldier compares with your desire to swell the number of names in the Blue Book.

When I see how profuse gentlemen can be in their professions of love for the soldier, how careless or reckless in legislating for him, how utterly unconscionable in their appeals to his feelings and his prejudices, I feel like paraphrasing the celebrated saying of Madame De Staël and exclaiming: "O soldier, for how much rascality and demagogy has thy patriotism been a cloak!"

Sir, the honest, patriotic, and intelligent soldiers of this land, whose valor preserved the Union, will no longer permit themselves to be shields for such rascality or the ready recipients of such unwholesome flattery. The time is rapidly approaching when in the interest alike of the soldier and the entire people the land and pension laws must cease to be patchworks of inconsistency and injustice. I have had the honor to present to this House a petition signed by over 5,000 ex-Union soldiers asking revision of the land and pension laws. Intimately connected with the question of pensions is that of preserving the public domain alike from domestic monopolists and foreign invaders. "Land for the landless millions" is the cry of the underpaid operatives in the great industrial communities, coupled with the strong and daring resolve that the invasion of our soil by alien freebooters and great corporations must stop. In this connection I want to put before the House and the country the following statement from the New York Star of January 6 last past:

OUR ALIEN LAND-GRABBERS—ONE RESULT OF REPUBLICAN MISRULE AND MISMANAGEMENT.

WASHINGTON, January 5.

Within the whole domain of public affairs there is no question of greater importance to the American people than that of land monopoly.

Between the Republican party, the railroad corporations, and foreign land-grabbers, the public lands are rapidly falling away. Within a very few years no less than 300,000,000 acres of the finest soil the sun ever shone upon have passed from the people into the hands of men who would hardly hesitate to overturn this Government if it were necessary to serve their ends. The poor man's inheritance, the public domain, is rapidly becoming a reminiscence.

Nothing in the history of the titled robbers of the feudal ages can compare with the recklessness that has characterized the Republican party in their management of the public lands, which were intended for the people and not for greedy capitalists or monopolists.

Land monoply in its best form (if that term be permissible) is a dangerous institution, but the danger is increased a hundred-fold when the land is held by men who are aliens by birth, by choice, and in principles.

To go into the details of this matter would fill column after column of your paper and tire the reader. A clear, concise table giving the names, locations, and amounts of territory controlled by foreigners will show the people the danger which threatens. Here are the names, etc.:

	Acres.
The Holland Land Company, New Mexico	4,500,000
An English syndicate No. 3 in Texas	3,000,000
Sir Edward Reid and a syndicate in Florida	2,000,000
English syndicate in Mississippi	1,800,000
Marquis of Tweedale	1,750,000
Phillips, Marshall & Co., London	1,300,000
German syndicate	1,100,000
Anglo-American syndicate, Mr. Rogers, president, London	750,000
Bryan H. Evans, of London, in Mississippi	700,000
Duke of Sutherland	425,000
British Land Company, in Kansas	320,000
William Whalley, M. P., Peterboro, England	310,000
Missouri Land Company, Edinburgh, Scotland	300,000
Robert Tennant, of London	230,000
Dundee Land Company, Scotland	247,000
Lord Dunmore	120,000
Benjamin Newgas, Liverpool	100,000
Lord Houghton, in Florida	60,000
Lord Dunraven, in Colorado	60,000
English Land Company, in Florida	50,000
England Land Company, in Arkansas	50,000
Albert Peel, M. P., Leicestershire, England	10,000
Sir J. L. Kay, Yorkshire, England	5,000
Alexander Grant, of London, in Kansas	35,000
English syndicate (represented by Close Bros.), Wisconsin	110,000
M. Ellerhauser, of Halifax, N. S., in West Virginia	600,000
A Scotch syndicate, in Florida	500,000
A. Boysen, Danish consul, in Milwaukee	50,000
Missouri Land Company, of Edinburgh, Scotland	165,000
Total	20,747,000

Writing recently in the Elmira Gazette upon this question, Rev. Thomas K. Beecher, a brother of Henry Ward Beecher, said: "We have here a high-lifting, frowning portent that should startle every intelligent patriot and cause him to instruct his Congressman inexorably to the effect that the ownership of land by non-residents must come to an end; and further, that the ownership of lands in great blocks must come to an end. However plausible, because profitable, their temporary occupancy may be, we can not afford to repeat in this country the horrible experiences of Ireland."

I am pleased, however, to state that the present Congress has taken a hold of this question of alien land ownership, and there is every prospect that the evil will not only be abated, but that some arrangement will be made whereby those immense tracts will revert to the people, to whom they properly belong and from whom they should never have been permitted to go. Congressmen McADOO of New Jersey, HOLMAN of Indiana, and HOPKINS of Pennsylvania have introduced bills that cover this important matter, and there is scarcely any doubt that they will pass. The people should urge upon their Representatives the necessity of supporting these bills.

The names, &c., of our native land monopolists would fill every page of this issue of the Star. I select only a few from the several States and Territories, as follows:

	Acres.
Hon. C. F. Brainerd, of Brainerd, Minn., a stalwart Republican, in Arizona	140,000
Hon. George Hearst, San Francisco	48,000
A. P. Moore, Santa Rosa, Cal	138,000
The Murphy estate, Santa Clara	150,000
F. C. Sherwin, in New Mexico	600,000
"My Dear Dorsey," star-router	500,000
Senator John A. Logan	80,000
Whitmore & Co., of Wisconsin, in Alabama	35,000
J. W. Iliffe, Colorado	15,000
Grandin Brothers, of Tidioute, Pa., in Dokota	40,000
Oliver Dalrymple, of Saint Paul, Minn	500,000
H. Disston, of Philadelphia	2,000,000
Hon. William Larabee, in Iowa	18,000
Walter Brown, of Kansas, in Kansas	43,000
Congressman E. N. Morrill & Co., in Kansas	102,000
J. B. Watkins, Louisiana	1,225,000
Daniel Murphy, Nevada	200,000
Mr. David Seltzer, of Ohio	25,000
Thompson & Warner, Minnesota	50,000
J. B. Walker, Minneapolis	50,000
Hon. J. S. Pillsbury, Minneapolis	30,000
J. M. Richmond & Co., of Buffalo, in Missouri	150,000
Michael Brand, sr., Missouri	100,000
Adirondack Land Company, New York	500,000
Hiram H. Sibley, of Rochester	500,000
William Clark	30,000
The David Raleigh estate, in New Jersey	30,000
Shenango and Alleghany Railroad Company	50,000
R. D. George, South Carolina	25,000
Colonel Meyer, Wisconsin	35,000
Governor Jeremiah Rusk, Wisconsin	18,000
Total	7,427,000

The above are simply a few specimens. There is not a State or Territory in this broad Union which does not contain scores, even hundreds, of men who hold tracts fully as large as those noted.

Concerning the railroad grants, those colossal monuments to corruption and robbery, it is impossible to speak with patience of the men and party responsible for them. I was informed the other day by a gentleman who served in the Thirty-seventh Congress that 300,000,000 acres of land were granted to railroad corporations within twenty years.

Since the beginning of the present Congress no less than thirty bills have been introduced declaring the land granted to railroads forfeited. Mr. Holman's bill is the most sweeping, and therefore better calculated to do justice to an outraged people. Should it pass, the railroad corporations of America will be compelled to disgorge 100,000,000 acres of the best land in America, which they hold in defiance of law, decency, and justice.

Discussing this bill one gentleman says that in Europe they have palatial homes for disabled soldiers. Sir, the American soldier is a citizen who volunteered from love of country to leave for a time the ranks of peaceful life to preserve the integrity and honor of his country. He is no liveried hireling of an ambitious prince, to spend his entire life under the rule of official martinets.

There are four volunteer soldiers' homes in the United States, namely, at Augusta, Me., Milwaukee, Wis., Hampton, Va., and Dayton, Ohio. A national board of managers, composed of Army officers, control these institutions. Red tape and discipline make them unattractive to the veteran. These old men with honorable scars are compelled to live by rule and die to order. Unlike the old soldier in Goldsmith's "Deserted Village," they sit not the night away, talking of scenes of past glory and carnage, but retire to drum-beat and raise their feeble bodies to meet the bugle-call. And the cry of the managers is for more homes.

That the soldiers themselves join this cry is simply because it is the only relief presented. For certain friendless and entirely homeless soldiers such homes, if properly conducted, are a necessity, but I speak for a great class, who could with this additional allowance manage with much more satisfaction to themselves to get along better without than within these institutions.

They want one in California, in Pennsylvania, in Michigan, and ever so many other States. Adopt this amendment, and the great home in Hampton, Va., in the mild, salubrious seaboard climate of our middle region, will hold nearly all applicants and save millions in the cost of new buildings. This monthly allowance, with the pension which most of them receive, will keep them in comparative comfort. Members say this would be an easy way to increase pensions. That is no argument. If the soldier is entitled to enter one of these homes he must be supported there, and it costs the Government just the same whether they expend it for him or he spends for himself.

Soldiers' homes! Mr. Speaker, I want, sir, to make true homes for the soldiers to whom we owe so much. No great, cold, heartless depot, where the inmates are treated as paupers, ruled by martinets, and surrounded by guard-houses, but the happy cottage home in the great centers of our civilization or on the free lands of the West. Not to be immured in some gloomy pile to pine and fret and die of heart-break, but the shady, vine-clad porch under the summer's sun, and the genial fireside with its prattling children and loving helpmate to rob the winter's day of all its gloom. Instead of bowing and fawning to every gold-laced superior, let the aged veteran spend his declining years surrounded by the loves and comforts, the sweet memories and holy influences, of a true American home. As I speak these words there comes before me the face and form of an aged veteran who has appealed to me to aid his claim for just dues before this House. His kindly face, his long gray locks, his manners, and his talk bespeak him the gentleman and scholar. Before the late civil war he was the author of a book on military tactics. He afterward rose to the rank of major in the Federal Army. Now, in the "sere and yellow leaf," weary with waiting for his claims, he comes to me with breaking heart and tears streaming down his furrowed cheeks, and asks as a last resort admission to one of these tombs of human hopes and loves and ambitions—a soldiers' home.

Mr. LAIRD. I give notice that I will call the previous question at 10 o'clock. I yield now for five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON].

Mr. CUTCHEON. I will not occupy the time of the House but a moment with any remarks on this bill. I desire to say I have given it very careful attention and studied this subject with a great deal of care as a member of the Military Committee. This bill comes here as the unanimous report of that committee. It comes here with the hearty approval of every member of that committee upon both sides of the House.

We recognized the fact, Mr. Speaker, that this system of soldiers' homes having been established and carried forward by common consent to this time, it is simply doing justice to the region beyond the Mississippi.

I wish further to call the attention of the House to a few facts which perhaps did not appear in the report, in order to show why we came to this conclusion. It appears from the statistics that the increase in the number of inmates during the year 1881 was 464. The increase in the year 1882 over the preceding year was 680. The increase in the year 1883 over the preceding year was 479. From a study of the statistics from the foundation of these homes until now we find the number of inmates is increasing with a very steady and constant ratio, and arguing from the experience of the past we have every reason to expect they will increase in the future in a like ratio. During the late visit of the Committee on Military Affairs with the board of managers of the National Soldiers' Home to the home at Hampton, Va., that board assured the members of the committee that in their opinion the number of inmates would constantly continue to increase for ten years certainly and probably for fifteen years. And it was the opinion of Major-General Franklin, and so far as I could learn the opinion of every member of that board, that when the maximum number of inmates would be reached it would double the number at present, which is something like seven thousand. So much for that point of the necessity for increase of accommodation.

In the second place I desire to meet the argument of my friend from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR], and the point I wish to make is this: This is not to provide for men who are pensionable under the laws, but to provide for men who are non-pensionable under the laws. This bill provides for those non-pensionable as well as for those who are pensionable.

And there is another thing. His argument was it would be better to pay these men pensions and let them spend the time with their families at home. But, sir, the unfortunate circumstance is, the great majority of these men have no families and have no homes and do not have anywhere else to go. Therefore if you deprive them of these national homes there is no refuge for them but the alms-house. There are today in the State of Michigan two hundred of these non-pensionable soldiers who are cared for in the almshouse, to the disgrace of the nation that they have not been provided for elsewhere. The State has no other means. I find from the figures taken from the last annual report of the board of managers that out of the entire number of 14,704 cared for in soldiers' homes last year, 1883, there were a little over 3,000 of them that had families to go to. If you take away from them these homes then it leaves them the almshouse and no other place to go to.

I say, sir, it would be a burning and a withering shame upon this Republic to let its brave defenders die uncared for in the almshouses of this country. And as this comes from the Military Committee unanimously and heartily recommended, I trust that it will pass the House by a unanimous and hearty vote.

Subsequently Mr. CUTCHEON was granted leave to append the following report to his remarks:

Mr. CUTCHEON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, subm'tted the following report:

The policy of establishing homes for honorably discharged and disabled volunteer soldiers is no longer an open question in this country. It was deliberately entered upon at the close of the war, and it has been deliberately persevered in and maintained ever since. Many millions of dollars have been expended in the creation and maintenance of these homes, and in fact we believe that we may safely say that it is the settled policy of this Republic to care for the support of its disabled and honorably discharged soldiers when left otherwise without adequate means of support, and especially when they would otherwise become objects of public or private charity.

There are at present four of these homes, the Central home, at Dayton, Ohio; the Eastern home, at Augusta, Me.; the Western home, at Milwaukee, Wis.; and the Southern home, at Hampton (near Fortress Monroe), Va. These are all technically and officially know as branches of the National Home. These branches, constituting the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, are under the charge and direction of a board of managers of nine distinguished officers, together with the President, Chief-Justice, and Secretary of War of the United States, who are members ex officiis.

The annual report of this board of managers will be found in House Miscellaneous Document 14, transmitted to the House January 9, 1884. The board of managers for the past year were as follows:

THE NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

Managers.

The President of the United States, the Chief-Justice, the Secretary of War, ex officiis.
General William B. Franklin, president, Hartford, Conn.
Col. Leonard A. Harris, first vice-president, Cincinnati, Ohio.
General John A. Martin, second vice-president, Atchison, Kans.
General Martin T. McMahon, secretary, 93 Nassau street, New York city.
Maj. David C. Fulton, Hudson, Wis.
General George B. McClellan, Orange, N. J.
General John M. Palmer, Springfield, Ill.
General Charles W. Roberts, Bangor, Me.
General James S. Negley, Pittsburgh, Pa.

In order to show the constant, rapid, and steady growth of these homes since their foundation in 1867 to the present time, and to draw therefrom an inference as to the prospective increase, the following table is inserted:

Number of members of the home present, and present and absent, at the end of each fiscal year; number of deaths during each fiscal year, and percentage of total deaths to total present and absent from the organization to June 30, 1883.

Years.	Central branch.			Western branch.			Eastern branch.			Southern branch.			Total present.	Total present and absent.	Total deaths.	Percentage of deaths to total present and absent.

Total			2,423			665			527			443			4,058

From this table it will be seen that the number of beneficiaries of the home has increased with a very constant ratio, from 403, in 1867, to 8,626 in 1883. The recent increase will be shown by the following figures for the last four years:

Total inmates, 1880 7,003
Total inmates, 1881 ..... 7,467—increase, 464
Total inmates, 1882 ..... 8,147—increase, 680
Total inmates, 1883 ..... 8,626—increase, 479

And this is in spite of the large number of deaths shown.

We are assured that the increase during the past winter has been greater than ever before, and has strained all the branches to their utmost capacity.

During the recent inspection by members of this committee of the Southern branch at the invitation of the board of managers, we found that that branch had been crowded beyond all reason or convenience. Three additional temporary dormitories had to be erected, the summer-house inclosed and converted into a dormitory, and an unfinished attic over the hospital, although unfit for use, had been utilized. In short, this branch has been forced to accommodate at least two hundred and fifty more than its proper and normal capacity. General Franklin, the president of the managers, assured members of your committee that during the last winter the Central branch, at Dayton, was crowded at least five hundred beyond its normal capacity, and the other homes or branches are full.

To assist in arriving at the probable demands upon the homes for years to come, we append the official statistics as to admissions, discharges, deaths, ages, &c., of inmates during the last fiscal year, as follows:

Annual report for the four branches National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers for year ending June 30, 1883.

Gain:
Admitted	2,252
Readmitted	651
Transferred	334
Total	3,237

It will be seen from the foregoing that the number of admissions last year was 2,252 and the readmissions 651—total, 2,903; discharged, 799; died, 485; deserted, 1,121—total, 2,405; net gain, 498.

The matter of age is also an important item. It will be noticed that only 1,711 are under 40 years of age, while 6,305 of them are upward of 50 years old, and the average will approach closely toward 55 years of age. As age comes upon the veterans, many who have heretofore been self-supporting must give up the battle for a living, though they have fought for it long and well. Judging from the experience of the past winter, we may safely conclude that during the coming fiscal year there will be a demand for accommodations for not less than 1,000 additional inmates.

It is the unanimous opinion of the members of the board of managers, with whom your committee have conferred, that the number of beneficiaries must constantly increase for ten years to come, and perhaps for fifteen years.

There can be but little doubt, judging from experience and the present outlook, that when the maximum is reached the number will reach nearly, if not quite, double the present accommodations. That provision should be made seasonably to meet this demand admits of no doubt nor room for discussion.

It does not answer this demand to say that the present system has its drawbacks; that may be admitted. It may be said that it would be better if these men could be provided for in their families. Let it be granted. But it will be noted that out of the whole number of the entire 14,704 cared for during last year there were but 3,315 who had wives or minor children.

With the great majority—nearly three-fourths of them—it is a question between the soldier's home and the poor-house. Can any intelligent and right-minded man hesitate which it shall be? The past and the future, patriotism and humanity, alike and equally cry out against leaving these men in almshouses. It was not so that we promised them. It is not so that this nation owes it to itself, its history, and its future, to provide for the men who fought its battles and preserved its integrity?

In the emphatic words of General Franklin to your committee, "We must have more homes."

The only question is, Where shall they be located?

The answer to that question is, They ought to be located in those States and among those communities which sent these men to the front, and where, so far as they have families, their families reside.

Several members of the committee were present with the managers during their interview with the inmates of the Hampton home, and noted with interest the universal desire of those that had families to be transferred to the branch nearest their families, even though it took them from the sunny and genial South to the comparatively inclement North.

We believe that in establishing these additional homes it will be wise policy to bring the home to the old soldiers, and not remove the old soldiers so far from all familiar scenes and associations that they can not occasionally see their old friends and neighbors and the old comrades who fought side by side with them. In giving them a home they ought not to be expatriated or removed from their own States or sections when it can be avoided. This policy has been already wisely recognized in providing for a home beyond the Mississippi, in a bill already reported from this committee.

The bills now under consideration provide for the establishment of a branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers in the State of Michigan.

The State of Michigan sent to the field during the war, from 1861 to 1865, about 93,000 men. Her population was then but 749,113, as shown by the census of 1860. In 1880 it had reached 1,636,937, and at the present time is estimated at very nearly 2,000,000. Of the population of the State at the outbreak of the war rather more than 10 per cent. were enrolled in the military service. It is believed that very nearly that ratio of the present population is made up of old soldiers. By reference to the last annual report of the national homes, we find that at the end of the last fiscal year there were in the several branches soldiers who enlisted from Michigan, as follows:

Central branch	203
Western branch	81
Southern branch	28
Total	312

At the last annual encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Michigan, held at Detroit, Mich., January 23 and 24, 1884, the following report was made and unanimously adopted:

"The committee on the subject of a soldiers and sailors' home in Michigan made the following report:

"Your committee, to whom was referred the matter of suggesting what legislation should be had relative to the establishment of a home for disabled Union soldiers and sailors at some point in the State of Michigan, would respectfully report that they have carefully considered the same, and they submit the following as in their opinion the most feasible and speedy plan of securing the desired result:

"Whereas evidence has been furnished this encampment by our comrade, William Shakspeare, quartermaster-general of the State, that a large number of worthy and deserving soldiers are pauper inmates of our county poor-houses; and

"Whereas it is also learned with regret that the four branches of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers are inadequate to supply the want they were designed to meet, and that large numbers of deserving soldiers and sailors are dependent upon others, or left to want: Therefore,

"Resolved, By the Department of Michigan Grand Army of the Republic in annual encampment assembled, that a committee be appointed by the department commander to draught a bill providing for the erection and permanent establishment of a Michigan home for disabled volunteer soldiers and sailors.

"Resolved, That such bill, when so draughted, be presented to our members of Congress, and that the department commander and the committee unite in an urgent request in behalf of this department that they use every honorable effort to secure its passage the present session of Congress.

"The report of the committee was unanimously adopted, and the following comrades were appointed to constitute the committee: R. F. Hill, of Post No. 79; George P. Sanford, of No. 42; and L. S. Trowbridge, of No. 17."

This department of Michigan represented at that time two hundred and twenty-one active posts and an actual active membership of upward of 10,000 veteran soldiers.

In addition to the foregoing the following memorial of the Soldiers and Sailors' Reunion Association of Southwestern Michigan, representing, as is claimed, 20,000 veteran soldiers, has been submitted to the committee:

HEADQUARTERS SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' REUNION ASSOCIATION OF SOUTHWESTERN MICHIGAN,
Buchanan, Mich., February 29, 1884.

In accordance with the resolutions adopted at the annual meeting of the Soldiers and Sailors' Reunion Association of Southwestern Michigan, held at Saint Joseph, Mich., on the 23d day of August, A. D. 1883, we, the undersigned, members of the executive committee of said association, respectfully recommend and urge the passage of the following bill for the establishment of a Michigan branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers:

An act to amend chaper 3 of title 59 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, entitled "National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers," by adding thereto sections 4838, 4839, and 4840.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That chapter 3 of title 59 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto three new sections, to stand as sections 4838, 4839, 4840, as follows:

SEC. 4838. Said board of managers are hereby authorized, empowered, and directed to locate, establish, construct, and permanently maintain a Michigan branch of said National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, to be by said board located at such place in the State of Michigan as to said board shall appear most desirable and advantageous, to be known and designated as the Michigan branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and to consist of a tract of land of not less than four hundred acres, and suitable accommodations for at least 4,000 disabled soldiers, and that the sum of $1,000,000 is hereby appropriated out of the United States Treasury, to be paid to said board, and by them expended for the purchase of the necessary land and the erection of suitable buildings thereon for said Michigan branch of said National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

SEC. 4839. That all honorably discharged soldiers and sailors who served in the volunteer forces of the United States in the war of the rebellion, and who are disabled by disease, wounds, or otherwise, and who have no adequate means of support, and by reason of such disability are incapable of earning their living, and who would be otherwise dependent upon public or private charity, shall be entitled to be admitted into said home for disabled volunteer soldiers, subject to like regulations as they are now admitted to existing National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

SEC. 4840. That within nine months from the approval of this act the said board of managers shall commence the erection of suitable buildings on the ground so purchased or procured for the use of said home. Said buildings shall be completed and ready for occupancy at as early a day as practicable.

R. F. HILL,
Z. ALDRICH,
C. E. DEXTER,
R. L. WARREN,
Executive Committee.

Secretary of Soldiers and Sailors' Reunion Association of Southwestern Michigan.

In addition to this there have been received and filed with the committee about fifty separate petitions from as many different towns and cities of the State of Michigan, praying for the establishment of a branch of the National Soldiers' Home in that State. It is claimed that about two hundred old veterans of the war are now supported in poor-houses and hospitals by public charity in the State. These are men whose bodies were shattered and whose health was wrecked in the defense of the Republic. They are proper subjects for support in a home for disabled soldiers like those at Dayton and Hampton.

With those now supported in the homes from Michigan (312), it is evident that there is a present demand for the accommodation of about five hundred inmates of such an institution in the State of Michigan. This number in the next ten years we may expect to see reach a maximum of nearly, if not quite, double that number.

If such a branch were located at some point in Southwestern Michigan, it would be contiguous to the northern portion of Indiana and Illinois, and in very complete railroad communication with them. The climate in that latitude is milder than that of Milwaukee or Augusta, and about the same as that of Erie, and but slightly different from that of Dayton. Beautiful and healthful locations can be found in abundance along the line of either the Michigan Central or Southern Railroads, or farther north, where such a home can be conducted as cheaply as at any point in the United States. The branch would be under the management of the Board of Managers of the National Home. The location would be left to their discretion. The amount of land to be acquired, and the manner of its acquisition, should be left to their judgment, as well as the extent of accommodations to be provided. The size and plan of buildings should also be left to them, to be added to from time to time as occasion might require.

In conclusion, we must have more homes. We do not consider such great aggregations as that at Dayton desirable. Discipline is more difficult of enforcement. The moral influence is not so salutary. Transportation is greatly increased; the soldiers are more widely separated from their families or associates. Smaller homes, more scattered, bringing the old soldiers nearer to their home influences and old comrades, we believe to be the truer and wiser policy.

Again, when these institutions cease to be needed for their present use it might be difficult to find appropriate use for such a vast concern as that at Dayton, while there would be no such difficulty in regard to the smaller institutions.

We therefore recommend that House bills 5050 and 5521 be reported back, with a substitute for both in accordance with the views herein expressed; that the sum to be appropriated be limited to the same amount recommended for the home west of the Mississippi River, to wit, $250,000; and that the quantity of land to be acquired and the number of inmates to be accommodated be left to the judgment and discretion of the said board of managers the same as at other branches, and that said bills 5050 and 5521 do lie on the table, and that said substitute do pass.

Mr. LAIRD. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD].

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Speaker, as has been remarked, this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Military Affairs, made after mature consideration. I did not expect when I came here to-night to say a word on any of these bills, but the very singular position which has been assumed by my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] induces me to occupy the attention of the House for a very brief time.

The gentleman from Ohio, in the course of his remarks, in criticising the management of these homes, has stated that these soldiers could be boarded cheaper at a hotel or tavern. I doubt whether that could be done. I doubt exceedingly, even if it could be done, whether they would have the same comfort, the same kindness shown them, and the same domestic feeling that surrounds them where they are. It is their home, sir, and there is something sweet, something beautiful, lovely, and touching in the very name of home. Boarding in a tavern is not home; it could not be home to them. They would be thrown among strangers, constantly changing, and there would be a foreign feeling in the very name itself. I doubt, also, as I have said, whether it could be done as cheaply; but even if it could, that is not a question here.

It is not a proper return for their brave efforts. When a soldier feels that he has fought for his country, that he has gone to the front in the time of her peril and danger and offered his life to protect her, and that country, grateful and mindful of his services, has made him a home for his declining years, he can say, with pure and grateful feelings rising up in his heart, "This is my home, my sweet home." Ay, more than that; he can say it is a home which is given to him by a grateful country, a home that has been purchased by his own blood, and given by a country that he loved to shed his blood for. He can say, "It is given to me by my country for whom I have given my best days; I love it, therefore, as a home, because no home on earth could be so dear to me as that one which comes through the kind and grateful hearts of my countrymen."

But the argument of the gentleman from Ohio would seem to imply the conviction that you have to force the soldiers into these homes. Mr. Speaker, that is entirely a mistake. There is nothing of that kind. No man is compelled to go into a home unless he desires. It is his refuge in age, poverty, and misfortune; and, as has been so well expressed by the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON], there are but two things left for him in his old age and poverty—either the national home or the almshouse.

Now, can anything be more degrading to the finer feelings of a man who has given his youth and his vigor and his strength for his country than to feel compelled in his old age to take up his home in the almshouses of the country because his country does not maintain him as it ought to? How humiliating it must be to a brave soldier to feel compelled to accept such charity, when he knows there was a time when his country was ready to expire, when it was in imminent peril and danger, and he stepped bravely to the front in her defense, and now that the day of peril is past he is entirely forgotten.

Can there be anything imagined better calculated to rob him of that gratitude he now feels for his country than to find himself a pensioner upon the bounty of a private charitable institution with the cold finger of scorn pointing at him, with no home of his own, and no home provided by his country? On the contrary, under the present humane policy pursued by the Government he may say with pride, "Here am I well cared for in my old age by the best government upon earth, the most loving country, and the most grateful. It has not turned me over to private charity." Mr. Speaker, I would not for one be willing to see our soldiers turned over to private charity. Gentlemen talk of the policy of giving them large and bountiful pensions in place of providing them with homes.

I have heard that ever since I have been here in this House, and yet I notice that whenever it comes to a question of giving arrears of pension to some poor disabled soldier or to his helpless widow and children the proposition is voted down. He can not get it. They are large in promises, and they are very slow of fulfillment. The soldier may well say that you are fruitful in promises; but here is a bill which proposes to give him a home in this Western country, in the place he has chosen for his occupation, for his residence. And I ask that this bill shall be passed, so that he may have this asylum.

But again we are met by the assertion that the most of these are not Americans, that they are foreigners, that they are not native-born to this country. That may be true to a certain extent; but even admitting it to be true, there are still many of them who are native-born Americans. But would you say to La Fayette, would you say to Kosciusko, who came and fought for the liberty of this country during the time that tried men's souls, "We will have nothing to do with you; you are foreigners?" What would you say to them? "It is true you loved our country. It is true you loved liberty. You left your homes and came to us in our trouble, but we purpose now to turn upon you the cold shoulder for all that you have done because you are not of us. You are not with us. You are not native-born to this country. You are not Americans. You are foreigners!"

Mr. Speaker, if many of these men who fought in our late war were foreigners they were those who loved the flag of this country and they added to its glory. Thousands upon thousands of them shed their blood upon the battlefields, or died in defense of the country; and it would be but a poor return for all of their services to turn the survivors adrift in their helplessness without food, shelter, or a home because they were foreigners. The survivors are our pensioners. The sea rolls between them and their native homes. They have no assistance from their native homes; they have no assistance from their native land. They shouldered their muskets in the time of our trouble and went bravely to the front; and, sir, I can not find it in my heart to refuse them that aid which is so much needed in their age and poverty. [Applause.]

Let others do as they will; for my part I am willing to say to them: "It is true you are not native-born Americans; true you were born under a foreign flag, but yet you came here when the question was asked, 'Shall the American Government survive the shock it is now called to endure; shall all the glory and power of this Government survive?' When that was being put to the test you shouldered your muskets and went bravely to the field of battle. Now let us turn to you and say we will give you a good home in your old age, even though you are foreigners." [Applause.]

I have said all I desire to say upon this question.

Mr. LAIRD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] seems to think there is no demand or desire for the establishment of this home. I think, sir, it might be assumed that the Grand Army of the Republic, an institution that is somewhat well known in this country, might be regarded as representative of the sentiment of the soldiers of the war of the rebellion. And I will remind you that at the national encampment of that organization held at the city of Denver last summer they appointed a committee to memorialize Congress on that subject, and that committee has been here day after day and week after week asking for the establishment of this soldiers' home west of the Mississippi River.

Again, as an evidence that there is a desire for this, I might say that the State of Iowa through its last Legislature appropriated the sum of $50,000 to be used if need be in the selection of a site to influence the location of this soldiers' home.

I think these are evidences that there is a public desire, the same that existed in the State of Ohio a few years ago, for the establishment of such a home; and I do not think that the criticism that the gentleman has made comes in good grace from him. I think that there may be something of selfishness laid to his door. He is a Representative from Ohio, and, representing the soldier element of that State, has secured all that they as a State can wish in this behalf. Having accomplished all that they desire, he now proposes to say that there shall be no other soldiers' homes established in the United States. There is a selfishness about that, I think, too gross for the gentleman from Ohio with his antecedents to indulge in.

Mr. LAIRD. I call for the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. MCADOO. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment can not be offered unless the gentleman from Nebraska withdraws his call for the previous question.

Mr. LAIRD. I believe I must insist on the call for the previous question unless it is agreeable to the committee that the amendment should be offered. There has been no arrangement about it that I know of.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the first amendment reported by the committee.

The first amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 2, section 2, after the word "managers," insert "unless the same be given."

The amendment was adopted.

The next amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 6, section 3, strike out the word "possible" and insert in lieu thereof the word "practicable."

The amendment was adopted.

The next amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 2, section 5, insert after the word "rebellion" the words "or in any other war in which the United States has been engaged."

The amendment was adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

Mr. MCADOO. I understand that now the gentleman from Nebraska is willing to have my amendment considered.

Mr. LAIRD. I am willing that it should be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can not be done, the previous question having been ordered, unless that action of the House is reversed.

Mr. MCADOO. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be considered at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey, that the amendment be considered by unanimous consent?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read Mr. MCADOO's proposed amendment, as follows:

Provided, That wherever a soldier has been an inmate of any one of the national soldiers' homes for a period of not less than twelve months, and shall have during that time a record of good behavior, it shall be optional with him to retire from said home and receive from the funds appropriated for the maintenance of the home of which he was a member $10 for every month he shall remain away from said home.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I have no objection to that if the gentleman will make it a year.

Mr. MCADOO. I accept the gentleman's suggestion and will modify my amendment so that it will read:

Whenever a soldier has been an inmate of any one of the national soldiers' homes for a period of not less than twelve months, &c.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 21, noes 40.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. CRISP. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 15.

Mr. CRISP. No quorum.

Mr. MAGINNIS. As the point of no quorum is made, and as I understand it to be insisted upon, I ask that by unanimous consent this bill go over to be acted upon by a full House, the previous question being ordered on it.

Mr. VALENTINE. I hope that suggestion will be agreed to if the bill will come up as unfinished business to-morrow in a full House.

Mr. PERKINS. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On the question of the passage of the bill the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] makes the point that no quorum has voted. The Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. KEIFER. It is evident there is no quorum present to-night. I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Montana had better be agreed to, that this bill go over as unfinished business until to-morrow morning.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I now again submit my request that this bill be allowed to go over as unfinished business, the previous question having been ordered on its passage, and that the House proceed to the consideration of other business reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. Here is a bill for the disposal of abandoned military reservations, a matter that was considered so important by the Committee on Appropriations last year that they put it on the sundry civil bill. It is a matter of importance to the whole country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent that the pending bill may be laid aside, retaining its place under the rules to come up as unfinished business. Is there objection?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I desire to know if the order made by the House now leaves the bill in such a position that it can be reached again this session?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will come up as unfinished business.

Mr. KEIFER. Of its class.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will come up as unfinished business in its order. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS]. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CUTCHEON. By consent of the gentleman from Montana I ask to have printed House report No. 1514, which has been nearly exhausted. It is the report of the Committee on Military Affairs on the proposed branch of the soldier's home in Michigan.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not think that motion is in order under the order of the House for business at this evening session.

ABANDONED AND USELESS MILITARY RESERVATIONS.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back with amendments Senate bill No. 1581, to provide for the disposal of abandoned and useless military reservations.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever, in the opinion of the President of the United States, the lands, or any portion of them, included within the limits of any military reservation heretofore or hereafter declared, have become or shall become useless for military purposes, he shall cause the same, or so much thereof as he may designate, to be placed under the control of the Secretary of the Interior for disposition as hereinafter provided, and shall cause to be filed with the Secretary of the Interior a notice thereof.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior may, if in his opinion the public interests so require, cause the said lands, or any part thereof, in such reservations, to be regularly surveyed, or to be subdivided into tracts of less than forty acres each, and into town-lots, or either, or both. He shall cause the said lands so surveyed and subdivided, and each tract thereof, to be appraised by three competent and disinterested men to be appointed by him, and who shall, after having each been first duly sworn to impartially and faithfully execute the trust reposed in them, appraise the said lands, subdivisions, and tracts, and each of them, and report their proceedings to the Secretary of the Interior for his action thereon. If such appraisement be disapproved, the Secretary of the Interior shall again cause the said lands to be appraised as before provided; and when the appraisement has been approved he shall cause the said lands, subdivisions, and lots to be sold at public sale, to the highest bidder for cash, at not less than the appraised value thereof, nor less than $1.25 per acre, first having given not less than sixty days' public notice of the time, place, and terms of sale, immediately prior to such sale, by publication in at least two newspapers having a general circulation in the country or section of county where the lands to be sold are situate; and any lands, subdivisions, or lots remaining unsold may be reoffered for sale at any subsequent time, in the same manner, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior; and if not sold at such second offering for want of bidders, then the Secretary of the Interior may sell the same at private sale, for cash, at not less than the appraised value, nor less than $1.25 per acre: Provided, That any settler who was in actual occupation of any portion of any such reservations prior to the location of such reservation or settled thereon prior to January 1, 1884, in good faith for the purpose of securing a home and of entering the same under the general laws, and has continued in such occupation to the present time, and is by law entitled to make such entry, shall be entitled to enter the land so occupied, not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres in a body, according to the Government surveys and subdivisions: Provided further, That said lands were subject to entry under the public-land laws at the time of their withdrawal: And provided further, That all patents heretofore issued and approved State selections covering any lands within the old Fort Lyon military reservation, in the State of Colorado, declared by executive order of August 8, 1863, are hereby confirmed; and the rights of all entrymen and settlers on said reservation to acquire title under the homestead, pre-emption, or timber-culture laws are hereby recognized and affirmed to the extent they would have attached had public lands been settled upon or entered; and such portions of said reservation as shall not have been entered or settled upon as aforesaid shall be disposed of by the Secretary of the Interior, under the provisions of this act, including lands that may be abandoned by settlers or entrymen.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause any improvements, buildings, building materials, and other property which may be situate upon any such lands, subdivisions, or lots, not heretofore sold by the United States authorities, to be appraised in the same manner as hereinbefore provided for the appraisment of such lands, subdivisions, and lots, and shall cause the same, together with the tract or lot upon which they are situate, to be sold at public sale, to the highest bidder for cash, at not less than the appraised value of such land and improvements, first giving the sixty days' notice as hereinbefore provided; or he may, in his discretion, cause the improvements to be sold separately, at public sale for cash, at not less than the appraised value, to be removed by the purchaser within such time as may be prescribed, first giving the sixty days' public notice before provided; and if in any case the lands and improvements, or the improvements separately, as the case may be, are not sold, for want of bidders, then the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, cause the same to be reoffered for sale, at any subsequent time, in the same manner as above provided, or may cause the same to be sold at private sale for not less than the appraised value: Provided, That where buildings or improvements have been heretofore sold by the United States authorities the land upon which such buildings or improvements are situate, not exceeding the smallest subdivision or lot provided for by this act upon the reservation on which said buildings are situate, shall be offered for sale to the purchaser of said improvements and buildings at the appraised value of the lands, and if said purchaser shall fail for sixty days after notice to complete said purchase of lands the same shall be sold under the provisions of this act: And provided further, That the proceeds of the military reservation lands sold on Bois Blanc Island near to Fort Mackinaw military reservation shall be set apart as a separate fund for the improvement of the national park on the island of Mackinaw, Michigan, under the direction of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 4. That the provisions of the act of August 18, 1856, relative to military reservations in the State of Florida, and the sixth section of the act of June 12, 1858, relative to the sale of military sites, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The amendments reported from the committee were as follows: In section 2 strike out the words "January 1, 1884," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "the passage of this act;" also strike out the word "such," before the word "entry," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "a homestead;" so that portion of the section will read as follows:

Provided, That any settler who was in actual occupation of any portion of any such reservations prior to the location of such reservation, or settled thereon prior to the passage of this act in good faith, for the purpose of securing a home and of entering the same under the general laws, and has continued in such occupation to the present time, and is by law entitled to make a homestead entry, shall be entitled to enter the land so occupied, not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres in a body, according to the Government surveys and subdivisions.

Also add to the bill the following:

SEC 5. Whenever any land containing valuable mineral deposits shall be vacated by the reduction or abandonment of any military reservation under the provisions of this act, the same shall be disposed of exclusively under the mineral-land laws of the United States.

SEC. 6. The Secretary of War shall have authority in his discretion to permit the extension of State, county, or Territorial roads across military reservations, to permit the landing of ferries and erection of bridges thereon, and permit cattle, sheep, or other stock animals to be driven across such reservation whenever in his judgment the same can be done without injury to the reservation or inconvenience to the military forces stationed thereon.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I now move the previous question on the third reading of the bill as amended.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask the gentleman to give me his attention for a moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unless the demand for the previous question is withdrawn, debate is not in order.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to insist on the previous question.

Mr. LAIRD. I would like to ask the gentleman one question. As this bill is now amended, will the lands affected by it be open to homestead entry, except by people now on the lands?

Mr. MAGINNIS. No, sir.

Mr. LAIRD. Then I desire to move an amendment to open the land to homestead entry as well as to sale otherwise.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I am willing to go as far as any other Western man in opening lands to homestead entry. But there are lands embraced within this military reservation which are worth a thousand dollars an acre, which lands may be disposed of under this bill. I do not think that Eastern people should have the cheek to ask permission to take up such lands under the homestead laws. This is a carefully drawn bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask that there shall be some debate on this subject.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I am directed to insist upon the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I now move to recommit the bill with instructions to report the same back so amended as to conform to the legislation adopted by the House to-day on the recommendation of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MAGINNIS. That has already been done.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. By what amendment?

Mr. MAGINNIS. By an amendment to the second section of the bill.

Mr. LAIRD. You have amended the bill so as to give the right of homestead entry to those who are on the land when this bill shall take effect, but you deny all other people the opportunity to enter this land for homesteads.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] will reduce his proposition to writing.

After some time,

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, said: I have reduced my proposition to writing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill as amended be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs with instructions to report a bill at the earliest possible day which will conform to the views expressed in the bill passed to-day on the subject of pre-emption, timber-culture, and homesteading.

Mr. VALENTINE. That has just been done by the amendments made to this bill.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, to recommit the bill with instructions, it was not agreed to.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. VALENTINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OFFICERS' THREE MONTHS' EXTRA PAY.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I now call up the bill (S. 675) to extend the benefits of section 4 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1866," approved March 3, 1865.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 4 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1866," approved March 3, 1865, be so construed as to entitle to the three months' pay proper provided for therein the heirs or legal representatives of all officers of volunteers specified therein who were killed or who died in the service between the 3d day of March and the 10th day of April, 1865.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the heirs or legal representatives of said officers the sum or sums of money to which they may be found entitled under the provisions of this act; and a sum sufficient to pay the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. CRISP. I would like to hear some explanation of this bill. It seems to me we ought to know what is the expenditure involved. Is there any report accompanying the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that this is a Senate bill.

Mr. CRISP. I ask the gentleman from California [Mr. ROSECRANS] to give us some explanation.

Mr. ROSECRANS. A House bill similar to this—House bill 5905—was referred to our committee and reported back; but there was no report further than a statement that the committee adopted in lieu of the House bill the bill of the Senate. The report of the Senate committee did not accompany the bill of the Senate when it came to this House; or if it did I did not see that report. I think, however, I understand the reasons for this measure. There were a few officers who died between the time of the passage of the act of March 3, 1865, and the close of the war. By a strict construction of that act, those officers having died without having been mustered out, their heirs could not obtain this three months' pay.

Mr. CRISP. I do not know that I fully understand the gentleman's explanation.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Perhaps I can explain the matter to the gentleman. Congress by the act of March 3, 1865, enacted that all such officers of the volunteer army as remained in the service until May 1, 1865, should be entitled to receive as a sort of bounty three months' extra pay upon being mustered out. Those who remained in the service until May 1, 1865, and were then mustered out did receive this bounty. Now, this bill proposes that the heirs of those who were killed in battle or who died between the enactment of the law of March 3, 1865, and the time when they would have been mustered out if they had lived shall receive this bounty of three months' pay proper, upon the presumption that if the officers themselves had not died or been killed they would have been mustered out and received the bounty.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROSECRANS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GEORGE P. WEBSTER.

Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. 472) for the relief of George P. Webster.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to place to the credit of George P. Webster, late a captain and assistant quartermaster of United States volunteers, the amount suspended in his accounts as such quartermaster, which was disbursed in payment of rents for certain property in the city of Covington, State of Kentucky, used for military purposes, during the period from October 1, 1862, to August 31, 1865, and that the said George P. Webster and his official sureties or bondsmen are hereby released from any liability to the United States on account of the amount suspended as aforesaid.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will inquire whether this bill has been considered by the Committee on Military Affairs and reported to the House?

Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania. There is a report accompanying the bill.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The bill was reported by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SLOCUM], who is not here to-night.

Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from New York who made the report is absent, and it is at his request that I ask to have the bill considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the bill is in order at this evening's session.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HORSE RAILWAY ON ROCK ISLAND.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I will detain the House only to call up one more bill from the House Calendar.

The bill (H. R. 445) to empower the Secretary of War to establish, under certain conditions, a horse-railway upon and over the island of Rock Island, and the bridges erected by the United States connecting the cities of Davenport and Rock Island therewith, was taken from the House Calendar, and the bill and amendments reported by the Committee on Military Affairs were read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 445) to empower the Secretary of War to establish, under certain conditions, a horse-railway upon and over the island of Rock Island, and the bridges erected by the United States connecting the cities of Davenport and Rock Island therewith.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to permit the location, building, and keeping in repair, upon the island of Rock Island, in the State of Illinois, and upon the arsenal bridges connecting said island with the cities of Davenport, Iowa, and Rock Island, Ill., in such manner as he, the Secretary of War, may deem fit, and so as to interfere as little as may be with the use of said island by the United States for a national armory and arsenal, a continuous line of double-track railway, at the expense of the Davenport and Rock Island Street Railway Company; which company shall have the privilege of running their cars on and over the said railway, at their own expense, under such regulations and restrictions as to times and manner of running the cars and rates of fare as the Secretary of War shall from time to time prescribe: Provided, That the rate of fare for employés of the United States at the Rock Island arsenal from Rock Island and Moline, in Illinois, and from Davenport, in Iowa, to the arsenal shall not exceed 2½ cents for one passenger for one way. The Secretary of War is empowered to suspend or revoke this privilege, and to remove said railway, at any time in his discretion.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is empowered to establish and enforce such rules and regulations as he may deem fit for collecting from said railway company, and for holding, expending, and accounting to said Davenport and Rock Island Street Railway Company for the moneys required for and expended in carrying out the provisions of section 1 of this act; and the decision of the Secretary of War as to the amount of moneys required therefor shall be final and binding on said railway company.

SEC. 3. That if any person or persons shall willfully and unnecessarily obstruct or impede the passage on or over said railway, or any part thereof, or shall injure or destroy the cars or any property belonging to said company, the person or persons so offending shall forfeit and pay for every such offense the sum of $20 to said Davenport and Rock Island Street Railway Company, and shall remain liable, in addition to said penalty, for any loss or damage occasioned by his, her, or their acts as aforesaid; and that the suits therefor may be had in the courts of the United States having jurisdiction: Provided, That this clause and penalty shall not apply to or restrict or affect in any way the officers or employés of the United States Government on said island in any act of theirs for the maintenance of good order on and for enforcing the rules and regulations pertaining to said bridges and island, and for enforcing the regulations of the Secretary of War for the government of said railway thereon.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to empower the Secretary of War to permit the establishment, under certain conditions, of a horse-railway upon and over the island of Rock Island, and the bridges erected by the United States connecting the cities of Davenport and Rock Island therewith."

Mr. COSGROVE. I should like to hear some explanation of that bill. As I understand its provisions it authorizes the Secretary of War to construct a street railway there.

Mr. MAGINNIS. It only gives permission.

Mr. COSGROVE. It does more than that.

Mr. MAGINNIS. It only gives the Secretary of War control of it. The title of the bill is wrong, and an amendment has been reported to it.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I move the House adjourn.

Mr. NEECE. Let us first pass this bill; it will occupy but a few minutes.

Mr. VALENTINE. Vote down the motion to adjourn and pass the bill.

Mr. MAGINNIS. This is for the benefit of the laboring men who go to and from their work at the United States arsenal on Rock Island.

The House refused to adjourn.

Mr. VALENTINE. I hope the gentlemen will permit this bill to pass. It is only to allow this railway to pass over Rock Island, whereupon the United States arsenal is located.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Do not make a speech, and the bill will pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendments of the committee will be voted on in gross.

There was no objection; and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. NEECE. I move the following amendment, which has the approval of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "way," in line 22, insert:
"And provided further, That the rate of fare shall not exceed 2½ cents per passenger for one way during the hours from 6 to 11 o'clock in the morning and from 5 to 7 o'clock in the evening."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I wish to have the attention of the House for a few moments. I have been familiar with Rock Island since 1845, and I do not think this bill ought to pass. Believing it ought not to pass, I say it can not pass to-night without a quorum.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. PRICE. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 5.

Mr. PRICE. No quorum.

And then, on motion of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE (at 10 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BRAINERD: Petition for the enactment of a general pension law—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. F. B. BREWER: Petitions from citizens of Jamestown and Dunkirk, N. Y., in regard to telegraph lines—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. BRECKINRIDGE: Petition of citizens of Hot Springs for legislation to settle titles to property on the reservations—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. T. M. BROWNE: Petition of 103 ex soldiers and sailors of the late war, on the subject of pensions, bounties, &c.—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CALKINS: Petition of S. N. Wood, for additional compensation as contestant in the case of Wood vs. Peters—to the Committee on Elections.

By Mr. LANHAM: Petition in relation to the claim of John F. Byars—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. MILLIKEN: Petition of Ruel T. Ellis, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MUTCHLER: Petition of citizens of Pennsylvania against a postal telegraph—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. POLAND: Resolutions of Jarvis Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Springfield, Vt., in favor of pension bill of Simon Grow—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RANDALL: Petitions of members of the Grand Army of the Republic, praying for the establishment of a national cemetery near Philadelphia—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. E. B. WINANS: Petition of Joseph Moyer, T. E. McCann, Sebastian Glading, and 80 other Union soldiers and sailors of Leetonia, Columbia County, Ohio, praying for favorable legislation by this Congress—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 25, 1884.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I move a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is not yet called to order.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senate adjourned, I believe, until 11 o'clock. It is now 10 minutes past 11. I think there is not a quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will please come to order. No quorum is present, as suggested by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS. I move a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. According to the rules the Journal can not be read until a quorum is present. The Senator from Kansas moves that there be a call of the Senate. Is the Senate ready for the question? [Having put the question.] The "ayes" have it and the motion is agreed to. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll and thirty Senators answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will read the list of absentees.

The SECRETARY. Messrs. Aldrich, Anthony, Bayard, Beck, Blair, Bowen, Butler, Camden, Colquitt, Cullom, Fair, Farley, George, Gibson, Gorman, Groome, Harris, Hill, Hoar, Jackson, Jonas, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kenna, Lamar, Lapham, Logan, McPherson, Mahone, Maxey, Miller of California, Morgan, Morrill, Palmer, Pendleton, Pike, Sabin, Sawyer, Sewell, Slater, Vance, Van Wyck, Voorhees, Walker, Williams, and Wilson—46.

Mr. FARLEY and Mr. MAHONE entered the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-two Senators are present.

Subsequently Mr. HARRIS, Mr. MAXEY, and Mr. HILL entered the Chamber.

After some little delay—

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I move that the Senate now adjourn, and I ask that the vote be taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 0, nays 40; as follows:

YEAS—0.

NAYS—40.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Jonas,	Pendleton,
Brown,	Farley,	Lapham,	Platt,
Call,	Frye,	McMillan,	Plumb,
Cameron of Pa.,	Garland,	Mahone,	Pugh,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	Manderson,	Ransom,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Riddleberger,
Coke,	Harris,	Miller of Cal.,	Saulsbury,
Conger,	Harrison,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Dawes,	Hawley,	Morgan,	Vest,
Dolph,	Hill,	Morrill,	Wilson.

ABSENT—36.

Aldrich,	Cullom,	Jones of Florida,	Sabin,
Anthony,	Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Sawyer,
Bayard,	George,	Kenna,	Sewell,
Beck,	Gibson,	Lamar,	Slater,
Blair,	Gorman,	Logan,	Vance,
Bowen,	Groome,	McPherson,	Van Wyck,
Butler,	Hoar,	Miller of N. Y.,	Voorhees,
Camden,	Ingalls,	Palmer,	Walker,
Colquitt,	Jackson,	Pike,	Williams.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

THE JOURNAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A quorum of the Senate having appeared, the Journal of yesterday's proceedings will be read.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LAPHAM presented a memorial of citizens of Homer, N. Y., remonstrating against the enactment of any measure relating to the telegraph which shall increase the number of public officials or establish a governmental monopoly of the telegraph business, or which shall employ the functions of Government to destroy the property of individuals who have embarked in legitimate enterprise to provide ample facilities for the public accommodation; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JONAS presented memorials of residents of Monroe, La., Red River Parish, Louisiana, and Shreveport, La., remonstrating against the enactment of any measure relating to the telegraph which shall increase the number of public officials or establish a governmental monopoly of the telegraph business, or which shall employ the functions of Government to destroy the property of individuals who have embarked in legitimate enterprise to provide ample facilities for the public accommodation; which were ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MCMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2234) to establish signal stations upon the island of Nantucket and submarine telegraphic communication with the mainland, asked that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations with a recommendation that it be made an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was agreed to.

He also, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1644) making an appropriation for the erection of a lighthouse on Canonicut Island, Narragansett Bay, Rhode Island, reported it with an amendment, and asked that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations with a recommendation that it be made an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Iowa, praying that a pension be granted to David Galbraith, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Iowa praying that pensions be granted N. D. Bates and others, submitted an adverse report thereon; and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

REPORT ON PRECIOUS METALS.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Committee on Printing instruct me to report favorably and without amendment a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives for printing the report of the Director of the Mint.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That 9,000 copies of the report of the Director of the Mint on the precious metals in the United States, for the year 1883, be printed; 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 3,000 copies for the use of the Director of the Mint.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the question is on concurring in the resolution.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is the regular annual resolution, and it varies in no respect. The cost is stated to be about $4,000.

The resolution was concurred in.

DEPARTMENTAL INVESTIGATION.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Expenditures of Public Money, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures of Public Money be, and hereby is, given leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate, and to pursue the investigation ordered by resolution of this body of the 23d instant by subcommittee appointed as such committee may order, either during the sessions of the Senate or the vacation of Congress, and the subcommittee appointed for the purpose aforesaid shall have all the powers in executing said resolution that are possessed by the full committee.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the resolution of the Senate to print 16,060 extra copies of the annual report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1883.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 675) to extend the benefits of section 4 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1866," approved March 3, 1865; and

A bill (S. 472) for the relief of George P. Webster.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (S. 828) to consolidate the Bureau of Military Justice and the corps of judge advocates of the Army, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 1581) to provide for the disposal of abandoned and useless military reservations.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 6215) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880; and

A bill (H. R. 7004) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands and the laws allowing entries for timber-culture.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no "concurrent or other resolutions" that order is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under Rule VIII. Order of Business 291 has been passed over by unanimous consent to await the return of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. ALLISON. I move to proceed to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7069) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations as amended, in line 93, after "document-room," to insert "(Amzi Smith), $2,592;" so as to read:

For superintendent of the document-room (Amzi Smith), $2,592.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 95, after the word "thousand," to strike out "four hundred and forty" and insert "six hundred;" so as to read:

Two assistants in document-room, at $1,600 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 99, after the word "thousand," to strike out "four hundred and forty" and insert "six hundred;" so as to read:

One clerk to the superintendent of the document-room, under resolution of the Senate of December 21, 1881, $1,600.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish the chairman of the committee would allow the amendment to be passed over for the present. It is a matter I should like to look at.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; let the amendment be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that this amendment be passed over informally, to be resumed at a later stage. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after the word "dollars," in line 103, to insert:

One clerk in the folding-room, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 105, before the word "messengers," to strike out "twenty-four" and insert "twenty-five," so as to read:

For twenty-five messengers, at $1,440 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 126, before the word "pages," to strike out "fourteen" and insert "fifteen;" in the same line, after the word "Chamber," to insert "including one telephone page;" and after the word "thousand," in line 128, to strike out "$235" and insert "$537.50;" so as to make the clause read:

For fifteen pages for the Senate Chamber, including one telephone page, at the rate of $2.50 per day each during the session, $4,537.50.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the "contingent expenses of the Senate," in line 137, after the word "stationery," to insert "and newspapers;" in line 139, after the word "Senate," to insert "and $100 for postage-stamps for the office of the Secretary, and $100 for postage-stamps for the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate;" and in line 142, before the word "hundred," to strike out "five" and insert "seven;" so as to make the clause read:

For stationery and newspapers, including $6,000 for stationery for committees and officers of the Senate, and $100 for postage stamps for the office of the Secretary, and $100 for postage-stamps for the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, $15,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 148, to increase the appropriation "for folding speeches and pamphlets, at a rate not exceeding $1 per thousand," from $2,000 to $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 153, to increase the appropriation for "miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor," from $10,000 to $34,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 155, after the word "Senate," to insert "including compensation to stenographers to committees, at such rate as may be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but not exceeding $1.50 per printed page;" and after the word "page," in line 158, to strike out "thirty-five" and insert "twenty-five;" so as to read:

And for expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate, including compensation to stenographers to committees, at such rate as may be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but not exceeding $1.50 per printed page, $25,000.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if this amendment has been carefully considered? I am advised that the present rate of compensation to stenographers to committees is $2.25 per printed page. This reduces the amount to $1.50, which is a very material change. If the amount now allowed is necessary to secure the efficient accomplishment of the work, then the amendment ought not to be agreed to.

I am not advised definitely about the fact, but have received information in a general way that the amount named in the amendment will not be sufficient to secure the satisfactory performance of the work that is provided for, and I should like to hear from the chairman of the committee on the subject. Of course if this is sufficient there can be no objection to it, but if the present amount allowed, two dollars and a quarter, is not more than enough, this would seriously interfere with the efficiency of the service.

Mr. ALLISON. The rule now is, I believe, as settled by the Committee on Contingent Expenses, to allow $3.15 a page for one class of printed matter in small type; $2.25 for the ordinary type which is used in this class of work; and $1 per page for all exhibits or mere addenda, documents attached.

The Committee on Appropriations looked into this matter as carefully as they could, and believe that a uniform price of $1.50 will secure competent people to perform the work. That is the opinion of the committee. For that reason we thought it best to insert this provision. I think it will be found to operate very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 159, to increase the total amount of the appropriations for "contingent expenses of the Senate" from $62,770 to $76,770.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "dollars," in line 160, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be expended for clerical services for any Senator, Representative, or Delegate in Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 165, after the word "thousand," to insert "five hundred;" so as to read:

For reporting the debates and proceedings of the Senate, $25,500, payable in equal monthly installments.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. At that point the committee have instructed me to offer an amendment which is not printed. I will offer it after the printed amendments are disposed of.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations for the "House of Representatives," in line 189, to increase the appropriation "for compensation of the officers, clerks, messengers, and others in the service of the House of Representatives from $335,355.10 to $336,955.10."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 242.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 240, after "Commerce," I move to insert:

Clerk to Committee on Naval Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 242, to insert:

For assistant clerk to the Committee on War Claims, $1,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 261, to increase the appropriation for the compensation of "doorkeeper" of the House of Representatives from $2,500 to $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 335, after "(John J. McElhone)," to strike out "six thousand" and insert "five thousand five hundred;" and in line 338, after the word "each," to strike out "twenty-six thousand" and insert "twenty-five thousand five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For one chief official reporter (John J. McElhone), $5,500; and four official reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House at $5,000 each, $25,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 363, after the word "accounts," to insert "but not exceeding $1.50 per printed page;" so as to make the clause read:

For miscellaneous items and expenses of special and select committees, including compensation, at such rate as may be fixed by the Committee on Accounts, but not exceeding $1.50 per printed page, to stenographers to committees, to be appointed by the Speaker on the application of committees, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 367, after the word "stationery," to insert "and newspapers;" so as to make the clause read:

For stationery and newspapers for members of the House of Representatives, officers of the House, and committees of the House, including $6,000 for stationery for the use of the committees and officers of the House, $47,625.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 403.

Mr. ALLISON. I move, in line 404, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one" and insert "two;" so as to read:

For contingent expenses of said Library, $2,000.

I will say that that is on the recommendation of the Committee on the Library. They think that sum is necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations for the "Civil Service Commission," in line 447, after the word "secretary," to strike out "one thousand six hundred" and insert "two thousand;" in line 448, after the word "dollars," to insert "one clerk at $1,200;" and in line 450, after the word "all," to strike out "seventeen thousand five" and insert "nineteen thousand one;" so as to make the clause read:

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

For three commissioners, at $3,500 each; one chief examiner, $3,000; one secretary, $2,000; one stenographer, $1,600; one clerk, at $1,200; and one messenger, $840; in all, $19,140.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 452, to increase the appropriation "for necessary traveling expenses" of the "Civil Service Commission" from $3,000 to $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the "Department of State," in line 467, before the word "clerks," to strike out "four" and insert "five;" so as to read:

Five clerks of class 3.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 472, to increase the total amount of the appropriations for the compensation of the Secretary of State, the assistant secretaries of state, clerks, and other employés in his Department from $112,350 to $113,950.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Treasury Department," in the appropriations for the "Secretary's Office," in line 509, before the word "assistant," to strike out "five" and insert "six;" so as to read:

Six assistant chiefs of division, at $2,000 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same clause, line 515, before the word "clerks," to strike out "forty-one" and insert "forty;" so as to read:

Forty clerks of class 4.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same clause, line 539, to increase the appropriation for compensation of "one paper-counter" from $660 to $720.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same clause, line 541, to increase the appropriation for the compensation of "twenty-six paper-counters and laborers" from $600 to $620 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 551, to increase the total amount of the appropriation for the compensation of the Secretary of the Treasury, assistant secretaries, clerks, &c., in the "Secretary's office" from $493,401.25 to $494,181.25.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the office of "Supervising Architect," in line 570, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty" and insert "forty;" so as to read:

Provided, That the expenditures on this account for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, shall not exceed $140,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall each year, in the annual estimates, report to Congress the number of persons so employed and the amount paid to each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the office of the "Second Comptroller of the Treasury," in line 587, before the word "clerks," to strike out "eight" and insert "ten;" and in the same line, after the words "class four," to strike out "twelve" and insert "sixteen;" in line 588, after the words "class three," to strike out "thirteen" and insert "fifteen;" and in line 591, after the word "all," to strike out "ninety-eight thousand three" and insert "one hundred and eleven thousand one;" so as to make the clause read:

Second Comptroller of the Treasury:

For Second Comptroller of the Treasury, $5,000; deputy comptroller, $2,700; five chiefs of division, at $2,100 each; ten clerks of class 4; sixteen clerks of class 3; fifteen clerks of class 2; twelve clerks of class 1; three clerks at $1,000 each; nine clerks at $900 each; one messenger; and three laborers; in all, $111,120.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the office of the "First Auditor," in line 616, after the words "class four," to strike out "nine" and insert "ten;" in the same line, after the words "class three," to strike out "ten" and insert "eleven;" in line 617, after the words "class two," to strike out "sixteen" and insert "eighteen;" and in line 620, after the word "all," to strike out "eighty-three thousand four" and insert "eighty-eight thousand eight;" so as to make the clause read:

First Auditor:

For the First Auditor of the Treasury, $3,600; deputy auditor, $2,250; four chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; seven clerks of class 4; ten clerks of class 3; eleven clerks of class 2; eighteen clerks of class 1; three clerks, at $1,000 each; two copyists and two counters, at $900 each; two assistant messengers; and two laborers; in all, $88,810.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the office of the "Second Auditor," in line 625, after the words "class four," to strike out "thirty-seven" and insert "forty-two;" in line 627, after the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty-two" and insert "fifty-eight;" in line 628, after the words "class two," to strike out "forty-four" and insert "fifty;" and in line 631, after the word "and," to strike out "thirty-two thousand six" and insert "fifty-six thousand two;" so as to make the clause read:

Second Auditor:

For Second Auditor, $3,600; deputy auditor, $2,250; six chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; eight clerks of class 4; forty-two clerks of class 3; additional to one clerk of class 3 as disbursing clerk, $200; fifty-eight clerks of class 2; fifty clerks of class 1; eight clerks, at $1,000 each; three assistant messengers; and eight laborers; in all, $256,290.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the office of the "Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department," in line 670, after the words "deputy auditor," to insert "who may be designated to sign, in the name of the said Auditor, such letters and papers as the Auditor may direct;" in line 673, before the word "chief," to strike out "eight" and insert "nine;" in line 676, before the word "clerks," to strike out "sixty-three" and insert "seventy;" in the same line, after the words "class three," to strike out "eighty" and insert "eighty-two;" in line 677, after the words "class two," to strike out "sixty-four" and insert "sixty-seven;" in line 678, after the words "class one," to strike out "fifty" and insert "fifty-three;" in line

679, before the word "female," to strike out "twenty-eight" and insert "thirty-one;" and in line 683, after the word "and," to strike out "thirty-three thousand" and insert "fifty-eight thousand three hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department: For the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, $3,600; deputy auditor, who may be designated to sign, in the name of the said auditor, such letters and papers as the auditor may direct, $2,250; chief clerk, $2,000; nine chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; fifteen clerks of class 4, and additional to one clerk as disbursing clerk, $200; seventy clerks of class 3; eighty-two clerks of class 2; sixty-seven clerks of class 1; fifty-three clerks, at $1,000 each; thirty-one female assorters of money-orders, at $900 each; three assistant messengers; twenty laborers; and ten charwomen, at $180 each; in all, $458,310.

The amendment was agreed to.

For General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service, $4,000; assistant general superintendent of the Life-Saving Service, $2,500; one topographer and hydrographer, $1,800; one civil engineer and draughtsman, $1,800; one draughtsman, $1,500; one principal clerk and accountant, $1,800; one clerk of class 4, three clerks of class 3, two clerks of class 2, five clerks of class 1, two clerks, at $1,000 each; five clerks, at $900 each; one assistant messenger, and one laborer; in all $36,680.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "office Supervising Inspector-General Steamboat Inspection Service," in line 832, before the word "clerk," to insert "chief;" so as to read:

One chief clerk, not to exceed $1,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the office of "Commissioner of Internal Revenue," in line 879, to increase the appropriation "for salaries and expenses of collectors and deputy collectors from $1,750,000 to $1,850,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "dollars," in line 880, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That from and after the 30th day of June, 1884, there shall be no more than forty-three collection districts; and it shall be the duty of the President, and he is hereby authorized and directed, to reduce the internal-revenue districts to not exceeding the number aforesaid, in the manner heretofore provided by law.

Mr. VANCE. Is it in order now to make an objection to the amendment suggested by the committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair). The question is, Will the Senate agree to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. VANCE. I move to non-concur, or rather I object to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question can be taken in the affirmative form just as well.

Mr. VANCE. So I understand. The proviso is:

Provided, That from and after the 30th day of June, 1884, there shall be no more than forty-three collection districts; and it shall be the duty of the President, and he is hereby authorized and directed, to reduce the internal-revenue districts to not exceeding the number aforesaid, in the manner heretofore provided by law.

The amendment, I think, ought to be disagreed to and the text of the bill as it came from the House ought to be adhered to by the Senate, for reasons which I will show in arguing the amendment further on. At the present time I will simply say that it is in the line of economy, and I have no doubt the revenue will be as well collected by having forty-three districts as by having the number now fixed by law, which is eighty-one I believe.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope that will not be done. If it is intended to collect the revenue from spirits it can not be done. The idea of collecting the revenue even in North Carolina by the reduction of the collectors to one-half, would be regarded, I am sure, by the Senator from North Carolina himself as preposterous.

Mr VANCE. I should like to hear some reason given by the committee who suggest this amendment why the consolidation can not be made and the revenues collected as well as now.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, there are now eighty-six collection districts in the United States, the number having been reduced by an order of the President last year. He has authority under the existing law to reduce the number as he may choose from time to time. The Committee on Appropriations investigated this matter as thoroughly as they could, and are unanimously of the opinion that it is an unwise thing to reduce in this way the number of collection districts; that instead of being a matter of economy it will result otherwise, and they therefore report the amendment striking out the proviso. That is all there is of it. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue says it will very materially interfere with the collection of the revenue and impair the efficiency of the service to do this.

Mr. VANCE. The reason assigned by the committee is that they think it unwise.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. VANCE. In my opinion (and I set that up against that of any one member of the committee, not against the whole number) it would be wise to reduce. I can see no reason, for instance in the State of North Carolina, where there are now four collection districts and where in some of them the cost of collecting is about equal to the money paid to the Treasury or at least 50 per cent. of it, why two collection districts would not be sufficient for the whole State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to say that I shall vote with the committee for this amendment, not because I see any very serious difficulty in carrying on the internal-revenue department after the consolidation of the districts, but because at this late day of the session and so near the beginning of the fiscal year to which the bill applies I can see great difficulty in arranging the matter. I have no doubt, as the Senator from North Carolina says, that one or two collection districts in North Carolina could do the business as well as four, retaining trained collectors, instead of having the whole machinery of the office circulated all over the country. I agreed with the committee that it was very doubtful whether at this time we should begin a reorganization. I vote with the committee now, not because of my opposition to the principle, but because of the difficulty I see in enforcing it just now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. VANCE. Let us have the yeas and nays. I want the record made up.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. VANCE. In line 880 I move to strike out "the 30th day of June," and insert "the 30th day of October." That would give the Department sufficient time—a full quarter—to make the necessary changes.

Mr. MORRILL. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina is not in order.

Mr. VANCE. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I was paired for yesterday with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. I do not see him in his seat to-day.

Mr. LOGAN. My colleague [Mr. CULLOM] is still absent.

Mr. KENNA. I understand that my pair with him still continues, so I refrain from voting. I should vote "nay" if the Senator from Illinois were present.

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired on all questions with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON], who is necessarily absent.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS. I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Aldrich,	Dawes,	Lapham,	Platt,
Allison,	Dolph,	Logan,	Plumb,
Bayard,	Fair,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Beck,	Frye,	Miller of N. Y.,	Van Wyck,

Edmunds,	Jackson,	Miller of Cal.
Gibson,	Jones of Nevada,	Riddleberger

So the amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 890.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations is, after the word "year," in line 890, to strike out all down to and including the word "nine," in line 895.

Mr. BECK. All that portion from line 890 to line 940 I understand to be one amendment, and therefore it should all be read before a vote is taken.

Mr. ALLISON. The suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky is a very good one. The provision from line 890 to line 940 relates to one topic, and may as well be read and considered as one amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The part recommended by the committee to be stricken out, as indicated, will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

And provided further, That the President is hereby authorized and directed to consolidate and reorganize the customs collection districts of the United States on or before the 1st day of October, 1884, so that the same shall not exceed in number sixty-nine.

And the President shall fix the boundaries of such reorganized districts and designate ports of entry therein, and shall also, from time to time, designate ports in each of such districts at which deputy collectors may be stationed to receive duties and other moneys, enter and clear vessels, and perform such other services in relation to the customs and navigation laws as he may deem necessary; and he shall give notice of the boundaries and designations of such reorganized customs districts; and said ports, when so designated, shall have all the privileges of ports of entry and delivery.

And the President is authorized and directed to discontinue the services and abolish the offices of such collectors, surveyors, and appraisers as may be necessary to conform to the number of collection districts herein provided for, and to designate places of deposit for the records and files pertaining to those collection districts which may be abolished pursuant to the provisions of this act.

Sections 2648 and 3687 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, together with all laws or parts of laws authorizing the allowance to collectors and surveyors of customs of salaries, fees, commissions, storage, and perquisites of whatsoever name and nature, are hereby repealed, to take effect on the 1st day of July, 1885; and all fees collectible by law shall thereafter be accounted for and paid into the Treasury as moneys belonging to the United States; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to provide for the collection of such fees by the use of stamps, under such regulations as he may prescribe.

And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to include in the regular Book of Estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and each fiscal year thereafter, estimates specifying in detail the number and class of officers and employés of every grade and nature, with the rate of compensation to each, that may in his judgment be necessary to properly conduct the business of collecting the revenue at each port of entry in the United States, together with an estimate of the amounts required for contingent expenses at each of said ports, and for such additional expenses of the service as can not be otherwise specially provided for: Provided, Nothing in this act shall prevent the shipment of merchandise to ports of delivery heretofore established by law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations, to strike out from the bill the words which have been read. Is there objection?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir; I hope it will not be agreed to. I could not agree with a majority of the committee in regard to that proposition, and I propose to give the reasons why.

Mr. President, this is an amendment prepared, as I understand it, at the Treasury Department, and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. While the internal-revenue districts were cut down by order of Congress one-third a year or two ago, or from one hundred and twenty-six to eighty-four, the number to which they are now limited, and the Secretary and Commissioner of Internal Revenue both protest that they can not be cut down any further without injuring the public service, so far as the customs districts are concerned, the Secretary, who has been carefully investigating this matter for two years by order of Congress, has come to the conclusion that he has no sort of use for, and that the public service does not require, anything like the number of customs districts that are now in existence, and he proposes in the interest of economy and the public interest to have them cut down as proposed by the House in this bill. Indeed, I am advised that the provision inserted by the House in this bill was prepared by order of the Secretary himself.

In his last annual report the Secretary presents the whole argument. I propose to lay a portion of it before the Senate. After stating the careful investigation he had caused to be made, first by commissioners and again by experts selected by himself, he says:

It was stated—

That is by those who made the investigation—

It was stated that those officers were variously compensated—some by salaries, commissions, and fees; some by commissions and fees only, some by salaries only—and that the amount paid was in some cases too small to insure the constant service of competent men, and that in others the salary and emoluments were excessive for the service rendered. It was shown that there are many districts in which no duties have been collected for years, and others in which the duties collected are not sufficient to pay the cost of collection. The labors of the officers in those districts are confined almost entirely to issuing documents to vessels, collecting hospital tax and fees, and making up monthly and quarterly returns to the Department, often of "no transactions."

I remember in the House of Representatives when this question was up years ago the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES], then chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, read a letter from an officer of a custom-house situated in some Western town (I think I will send for the speech and read it) where he showed that he had nothing to do but draw his salary of some $3,000 a year; and he was dismissed in a very short time after he made the report that there was no use for him as all he had to do was to go quarterly and draw his pay. He wrote to the Department to know why he had been dismissed, and the only reason that he could imagine why he had been dismissed was because he had been such a fool as to tell the truth and expose the situation by stating that all his work was to draw his salary quarterly; and I think he said it was perhaps upon the ground of lunacy that they dismissed him. That letter is in the Globe, which perhaps I shall read after a little while. He returned "no transactions," as the Secretary of the Treasury says is the case with many of them. The Secretary proceeds:

Custom-house fees began with the act of March 2, 1799. It was thought that the customs service would be practically self-sustaining, and that the burden of its maintenance should fall on those who had dealings with it, with nominal salaries only, in addition to fees. The system has not been self-supporting. The aggregate amount of fees collected is about $600,000 per annum; the annual cost of collecting the customs revenue is over $6,000,000.

These fees are made up of small and annoying exactions from importers and ship-owners, difficult to collect, and involving much unprofitable clerical work in accounts. Besides that, the sum of them, in instances, is so large as to compensate the officer beyond desert.

The advantage of fixed salaries is obvious. An objectionable feature of the present system is the temptation at small ports to obtain "additional compensation for storage" under the bonded warehouse system. Then, too, is the uncertainty of the amount of compensation. By the act of June 23, 1874, Congress recognized all this, and gave fixed salaries to the officers of leading ports, but left others unchanged.

The oaths required to be taken before collectors upon entry of merchandise are, as a rule, formal. They cause inconvenience to importers by compelling their personal attendance at the custom-house. They deter not the dishonest from fraudulent entries. They add not to the security of entries by honorable merchants. A simple declaration by the importer, attested by a notary, sanctioned by penalties, would prove a relief to merchants, and be as safe.

Now, I desire the Senate to note what follows; no man can truthfully contradict it. The Secretary says:

There are useless customs districts, and nothing but local pride or interest will disagree therefrom. There are twenty-two ports of entry at which not a dollar of duties has been collected for years, at different times. There are thirty-two ports of entry in which the year's collections from all sources have not equaled the year's expenses. These had importance when foreign trade was carried on in sailing vessels, and before the concentration of importations at large ports from regular lines of ocean steamers, and the present system of rapid inland transportation. The custom-houses in these districts are, however, kept up, with all the formalities of activity, with deputies, inspectors, and clerks, to make official returns to the accounting officers of the Treasury and the Bureau of Statistics.

The consolidation of districts and diminution of ports of entry are called for by sound business considerations, and may be accomplished without increasing smuggling or withdrawing proper facilities for documenting vessels.

The issuing of papers to vessels and the collection of hospital dues may as well be done by subordinates, and the unproductive districts abolished, saving expense and promoting the efficiency of the service. Owing to the inequalities in the present compensation of collectors and surveyors, and to the nature of some of these offices, sinecure almost, it was found impracticable to adopt any uniform rule for fixing salaries of collectors and surveyors under the present organization.

I was then, and am now, convinced, upon a careful consideration of the subject, that districts should be consolidated and the number thereof reduced. The matter is of such importance, as bearing upon an economical conduct of public affairs, that I presume to present it in this annual report, and to again offer my views and the facts and considerations which I think uphold them, and to renew the propositions which I then made.

The Secretary next proceeds to give the details of the present system, showing the expense of it, at considerable length. After stating how much is provided for as a permanent appropriation, and that all penalties, forfeitures, fines, and other things are added to the permanent appropriation and set apart to pay the expenses of the collection of customs, which he sets forth with care in the report which I hold in my hand, he says:

In addition thereto is the amount to come from the provision of the United States Revised Statutes, section 3687, which makes a permanent annual appropriation of $2,750,000 for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for each half year, in addition to such sums as may be received from fines, penalties, and forfeitures connected with the customs, and fees paid into the Treasury by customs officers, and from storage, cartage, drayage, labor, and services. In the year 1882 the amount derived by the operation of this section increased the available funds to the sum of $7,566,688.24; in 1883 to $7,953,329.51. These figures are furnished to me from the warrant division of this Department. If they err at all, it is that they are less rather than more than they should be. Consolidation, according to the estimate above given, is, in expense, less than this nearly $1,500,000.

Yet the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate move to strike out a provision inserted in the bill by the House of Representatives, approved by the Secretary of the Treasury if not drawn by himself, a substantial copy of which will be found in his last report to Congress, on page 80, as the draught of a bill he proposes by which he says he can save, say, from a million to a million and a half annually and do the customs business of the country better than it is done now, getting clear at the same time of the machinery in fifty-odd districts, twenty-two of which pay nothing and thirty-two do not pay their expenses. To that proposition of the Senate committee I object.

In this carefully prepared report so earnest was the Secretary to give us full, fair information that he gives a schedule of the estimated expenses and of the needed number of employés, estimating for them proper wages, that would result from the consolidation which he recommends.

Besides all this, his plan enables us to get rid of an evil that we have been long complaining of. We have passed measures through the Senate once or twice on the recommendation of the then Secretary of the Treasury, the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], abolishing all these permanent appropriations so far as they apply to payment of salaries and expenses in the collection of customs, bringing them, as we do all other officials, annually within the supervision of Congress for the regulation of their salaries and other expenses, and require them to give us an account of their services, and the reasons why they should be continued. To-day in all these useless custom-houses where they could not get a dollar appropriated under the supervision of Congress by means of permanent appropriations, fines, forfeitures, and penalties, they pay these officials what they please and account to nobody except to make up their statement of what is paid, which is furnished to Congress by the Register of the Treasury in a book which Congress never looks at, because it has no control over these things and is not consulted about them.

While we are solemnly going over this legislative bill of one hundred and nine pages, cutting down a clerk here, and a charwoman there, and thinking we are prodigies in the line of economy because we can shave off a little here and trim and nail a little there, and prevent by withholding needed help the Land Office from doing its duty, or the Pension Office from doing its duty, or the Patent Office from doing what it ought to do promptly, all in the interest of economy of course, here is a great customs system permeating all the cities in the land, involving seven and a half million dollars for salaries and expenses, not one dollar of which comes under the supervision of Congress, but a permanent appropriation of $2,750,000 given for each half year to be taken just as they like, and all the fines and all the forfeitures and all the penalties, the cartage, the storage, everything they please to squander just as they like for political or any other purposes they see fit. Yet when the Secretary tells us this ought not to be; that many of these districts ought not to exist, and that the men should be paid under the supervision of Congress by fixed salaries, which he estimates for and inserts in his annual recommendation, the Senate committee propose that we shall ignore all these recommendations.

This provision is not like that relating to the internal revenue. This is to take effect on the 1st day of next October. Three months' time to adjust the chances is given, instead of on the 30th of June, 1884, only a day or two, as the other proposes. Within the three months the Secretary of the Treasury can reorganize all those districts. The House at first had cut them down to I think sixty-seven, but upon the recommendation of the Secretary two districts in Oregon were added to points where new lines of railroad had reached on the Pacific Ocean. Those two were added so as to do no injustice. The districts are so arranged by the bill as to enable the Secretary to carry out the plans he proposes and to make the saving he proposes, and to bring the officials with their fees and their salaries under the eye of Congress instead of having them permanently appropriated for as they have been for years, to the great detriment of the public interest.

Mr. President, the amendment of the Senate committee ought not to be agreed to. The Secretary ought to have a chance to correct and the country ought to have a chance to get rid of these useless and expensive incumbrances. There ought not to be fifty-odd useless collection districts that the Secretary says should be abolished as well as the system of paying the officers in the way they are paid now, some not getting enough, others three times more than they are entitled to, through an old system of fees that has shown to be unjust and vicious, giving some men large salaries for doing nothing, while difficult, complicated custom-house machinery is kept up that ought to be dispensed with.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to inquire what would be the annual saving if the policy recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury should be adopted?

Mr. BECK. He assumes that it would not be less than $1,000,000. He makes the calculation in two or three different ways. In one case he says it would be some $500,000 if a certain view should be adopted; then he says it would be $1,000,000 if another view is taken. I will read again from his last annual report:

> In addition thereto is the amount to come from the provision of the United States Revised Statutes, section 3687, which makes a permanent annual appropriation of $2,750,000 for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for each half year, in addition to such sums as may be received from fines, penalties, and forfeitures connected with the customs, and fees paid into the Treasury by customs officers, and from storage, cartage, drayage, labor, and services. In the year 1882 the amount derived by the operation of this section increased the available fund to the sum of $7,566,688.24; in 1883, to $7,953,329.51. These figures are furnished to me from the warrant division of this Department. If they err at all, it is that they are less, rather than more, than they should be. Consolidation, according to the estimate above given—
> That is the only estimate which the House has adopted—
> is, in expense, less than this nearly $1,500,000.

But the improvement of the system will be worth $1,500,000 more, because as long as they have the right to impose fines, penalties, and forfeitures and charge for storage, cartage, drayage, labor, and services what they please and make what threat they please to enforce obedience to them, what compromises or corrupt bargains they please, no man will ever know how much they really do get for so-called services. But if they are brought before Congress as every officer ought to be brought to give annually an account of his work and as every other officer except custom-house officers are now brought to have his salary fixed under the supervision of Congress and have annual salaries paid them according to the labor done, then the abuses of the system will be largely diminished if not cut off, which will be more valuable to the public service than the saving of money suggested by the Secretary. The two considerations together make it, in my opinion, the imperative duty of Congress to agree with the House in the proposition made in the bill to give the Secretary a chance to do what he says he can do and desires to do, all the details of which with great completeness he sent to us in his last annual report and urged us to do.

It is so seldom that a public official comes before Congress and asks to cut down expenditures, points out the evil of existing systems, and recommends Congress to take under its own control its public employés instead of giving them corruption funds in the shape of fees, penalties, forfeitures, cartage, drayage, storage, and all sorts of things, with a permanent appropriation to be dispensed with by them as they please, it ought to be the pleasure of the Senate at once to say to that officer, "We will hold up your hands and strengthen your efforts in this reform," instead of striking it down when the House of Representatives with signal unanimity inserted it in the bill which is now before us.

Several gentlemen around me have inquired whether this change and consolidation of districts would not have the effect of diminishing the present conveniences existing at ports of entry and ports of delivery. I answer, no; it will destroy the complicated machinery now existing at many of the useless ports, but there will be deputy collectors and other necessary officers who will be at all existing ports ready to receive, with as much convenience to the public, all goods coming from abroad and see to the export of all goods desiring to be sent abroad as if it was a principal port of entry with all its complicated and expensive machinery. The civil service, as they call it, at the small ports will be cut down, the machinery will be diminished, but none of the existing guards against smuggling be decreased, nor will any inconvenience ensue either to the importer or the exporter, or to any man having any connection with the public business at those ports. So the Secretary assures us. I was looking to see if I could lay my hand at this moment on that portion of his report where he says so. I think it is substantially here. Let me read anyhow. He says:

> The plan outlined in Schedule No. 2 is the result of much thought and careful inquiry. A test in practice may show some imperfections, and doubtless will. Alteration in the plan suggested, clearly in the way of improvement, may, from time to time, be needful. In the event of adoption of it by Congress, with the numbers and boundaries of districts fixed by enactment, the Executive could not apply an immediate remedy to evils that practice might show to exist. Hence, there may be doubts whether a system unchangeable, save by legislation, is the best mode for a practicable as well as an economical administration of the customs service. To forestall failure the power could be given to the President to alter districts and designate or appoint officers thereto, as is his power with internal-revenue collection districts, by section 3141 of the United States Revised Statutes.

I now agree to these views; but it was only after some care and a great deal of consideration, because when that report first came to Congress I looked at it with what care I could. Other members of the Committee on Appropriations looked at it. The chairman of the committee [Mr. ALLISON] and myself went over it with experts from the Treasury Department. We examined the provision which is now placed by the House in this bill, because it is substantially incorporated into the bill as it passed the House. We were afraid that it might confer some power to the Secretary or to the President that might be abused, or that might cause some discontent. Therefore I called upon the Secretary and asked him to prepare a bill designating the districts as he desired them, which bill I hold in my hand, being Senate bill 1853, introduced by me on the 17th of March, 1884, and after a good deal of consultation between the chairman and myself, and with the Finance Committee, and with the Committee on Commerce, I had it referred to the latter committee. It is the bill to which the Secretary in the suggestions I have just read objects, although he drew it himself, because he says, as you will observe, that upon further examination he does not think it wise to have districts appointed by law which are unchangeable. He uses this language:

> Hence, there may be doubts whether a system unchangeable, save by legislation, is the best mode for a practicable as well as an economical administration of the customs service. To forestall failure, the power could be given to the President to alter districts and designate or appoint officers thereto, as is his power with internal-revenue collection districts, by section 3141 of United States Revised Statutes.

I believe now, after a careful investigation of it all, that the first suggestion of the Secretary in the bill he has drawn, which is substantially adopted by the House as part of his annual report, is better than the bill which was drawn designating each of the districts to be fixed by law and which is now before the Committee on Commerce of this body, because those districts might not be so fixed as to promote the interests of the public service properly. The Secretary, acting for the President, can find out from time to time what modifications ought to be made and the power ought to be in his hands at all times to make those modifications. So, while I introduced the bill, as I believed that was the best thing to do at first, I am now satisfied that the Secretary is right and the House is right in giving him general authority. I also think they were right in adding those two districts on the Oregon coast as they did. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] suggested to me some time ago these difficulties, because he knew railroads were being built there and at other points. They are now made a part of the provision.

For these reasons and for many others I might give I hope the Senate will not agree to the amendment proposed by the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I am rather surprised at my friend from Kentucky, a member of the Committee on Appropriations, pressing the House provision as earnestly as he does, in view of the fact that it is in violation of the general rule prevailing here with reference to inserting new and radical legislation upon an appropriation bill. Of course I agree that we can legislate, as we do often legislate, with reference to immediate appropriations.

Mr. BECK. The provision was inserted in the bill by the House. I did not move it.

Mr. ALLISON. But laying that matter aside, I was rather misled, as I think the Senator from Kentucky has been misled, by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of our customs collection districts. When I first looked that report over it seemed to me that there was something in his suggestion, but the more I have examined it the more I am averse to it. I am satisfied that if the Senate understand the proposition they will never give their consent, nor will either House of Congress, to what is proposed in the bill.

In the first place, it is a practical repeal of nearly fifty pages of the Revised Statutes, the sections which run from page 492 to page 536, statutes that have been passed from time to time, since the organization of our Government, establishing collection districts at the different ports and in different sections of our country.

It is proposed that the two Houses of Congress shall by this provision abdicate their legislative function and place the entire control and jurisdiction of this question with reference to the places of ports of entry and ports of delivery in the hands of a single executive officer of the Government. I am amazed for one that a proposition of this kind should emanate from the Democratic side of the Chamber, to say nothing of any other place where it has originated. Here is a proposition to abolish every port of entry and every port of delivery in the United States, and there are a great many of them, I think about one hundred and forty in all now, and to give into the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury the power to re-establish ports of entry at such places as he may think wise, not as may be thought wise by the representatives of the people, but it is proposed that he shall have the power to divide up this country as he chooses, establishing a port of entry here and a port of entry or a port of delivery there, without consultation with the people who are most interested in these questions.

Mr. LAPHAM. If the Senator will pardon me, I will state that the bill gives to the President the vast power to which he refers.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; it is given to the President of the United States. It will, of course, be only exercised through the Secretary of the Treasury; it can not be exercised by the President personally.

I ask the Senator from Kentucky, or any other Senator on this floor, if a Secretary of the Treasury, sitting in the Department at Washington, knows more about how your ports of entry and ports of delivery should be established in the far-off State of Oregon than does the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] who sits before me? Is it so in the State of Florida, in the State of Georgia, in the State of Louisiana? Since this provision has been pending before the Committee on Appropriations, more than fifteen Senators have approached me upon the subject, saying that if this clause was not to be absolutely stricken out they wanted a rearrangement and readjustment different from that provided by the Secretary of the Treasury in Executive Document No. 73, House of Representatives, second session, Forty-seventh Congress. There is not a Senator on this floor, who has a port of entry or a port of delivery in his State, who is satisfied with that document. Yet we propose to abdicate our legislative power here and turn it over to the President or to the Secretary of the Treasury. For one, I shall never consent to give that power into the hands of the President or the Secretary of the Treasury, no matter who he may be or what measure of confidence I may have in his administration.

Mr. BECK. Allow me to ask the Senator a question; it will save me from answering him, perhaps. All the internal-revenue districts to-day are changed in the discretion of the President and of the Secretary of the Treasury, without consulting any Representatives or Senator, just as the executive officer pleases. How does the Senator answer that?

Mr. ALLISON. I shall answer that in a moment?

Mr. BECK. How is that to be answered?

Mr. ALLISON. That is easily to be answered. That is an entirely different thing.

Mr. BECK. I should like to hear the answer.

Mr. ALLISON. The question of the establishment of ports of entry and ports of delivery relates to the external and internal commerce of this country. It enters into the heart of every community and of every city of this Union. I see the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER] before me. How would he like the President of the United States, or the Secretary of the Treasury, or any other officer to have the power to abolish the port of entry of Detroit? That is what this involves. It does not involve merely the collection of so much money, as the internal revenue involves. It involves all the ramified questions that are involved in the internal and external commerce of our country. Every vessel that sails in our coastwise trade, every vessel that sails upon our rivers and estuaries must be examined by some one of the collectors of customs and a certificate must be given. In numerous cases that I have examined in looking over this matter, it will compel the owners of vessels, for instance upon the Mississippi River, to make a journey of one hundred or two hundred or three hundred miles to a distant port for the purpose of having an officer register the vessel. There is no sort of analogy between this and the collection of the internal revenue, which is a fixed revenue on specified objects, and has no relation whatever to the great internal and external commerce of our country. That is my answer to the Senator from Kentucky on that question.

It is said that there is to be a saving by this consolidation. That is in a great measure only a pretense. I have looked over the Executive Document No. 67 with great care, and instead of a suggestion even by the Secretary of the Treasury that there is a saving of a million dollars, his suggestion is only a saving of $486,295; but when he comes, as is proposed by this measure of consolidation, to pay fixed salaries to all these officers, when he comes to abolish the ports of delivery as is proposed here, then as a matter of course there will have to be a great number of additional officers added to the list already there; and I venture the assertion that after we adopt the suggestions of the Secretary of the Treasury in this regard within a year or two the official list will be swelled far beyond the present exigency.

So I am opposed to the general policy of placing in the hands of any executive officer the great powers which belong exclusively to the legislative branch of this Government, and which have never been exercised in any other way except by acts of Congress since the foundation of the Government.

Now, when you come to look at the details of the provision here, what is proposed? In the first place, to reduce the number of districts to sixty-nine.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the number now?

Mr. ALLISON. The number now is about one hundred and thirty-nine or one hundred and forty-one; I do not remember exactly, but exceeding one hundred and thirty. Why this particular number of sixty-nine? In another place, when this was suggested upon an appropriation bill, one Representative rose and said that it was an absurd provision in reference to his State, and another Representative rose and said it was an absurd provision in reference to his State; and so in two minutes the committee that reported this provision—if I am permitted to speak of it—made a change and increased the number two.

If we are to limit the number here, is it probable that any Senator on this floor is satisfied with the number sixty-nine? The Senator from Kentucky said that he agreed with the Senator from Oregon that it was wise to increase the number of districts in the State of Oregon two beyond the original proposition, thus increasing the total from sixty-seven to sixty-nine. That object is not secured by the increase. The whole question of whether there shall be one, two, or three collection districts in Oregon is still open under this provision, and left unqualifiedly and absolutely in the control of the President of the United States as exercised by his Secretary of the Treasury. So my friend from Oregon may be cheated after all; and, besides, it was only intended that one of the additional districts should apply to Oregon, and the other was to apply to Massachusetts. But I am not content myself with this provision. I should want seventy instead of sixty-nine, so as to include a portion of my own region. How do I know that if we add one to this number and make it seventy, the present Secretary of the Treasury or another Secretary of the Treasury will not say that instead of reducing the number of ports of entry in Massacuhsetts from ten to three, it is an unwise thing to do that; and instead of having ten in the State of Massachusetts he will have seven in Massachusetts, and thus cut out another region of country entirely.

The absolute injustice of placing this whole subject in the power of one man is that he has the control of every State of this Union, and every Senator and Representative is bound to go to him and say, "I want this, that, and the other number;" and, after hearing all, he can do as he pleases. It is not so as to the internal revenue. That is as to the number of districts. But see what further is proposed here:

> The President shall fix the boundaries of such reorganized districts, and designate ports of entry therein.

All ports of delivery are abolished by this provision. It is true that it authorizes the President from time to time to—

> Designate ports in each of such districts at which deputy collectors may be stationed to receive duties and other moneys, enter and clear vessels, and perform such other services in relation to the customs and navigation laws as he may deem necessary.

The Secretary of the Treasury can go into my State or into your State, sir, and say what shall or shall not be done at these places designated by the Secretary of the Treasury. Are we to establish an autocracy in this country in the Treasury Department or in the Executive Mansion with reference to all these great questions of external and internal commerce? For one I shall never agree to it by my vote.

So you may go on and you will find further that this provision in the bill proposes to repeal sections 2648 and 2687 of the Revised Statutes. What are they? They are the two sections which authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the necessary expenses of collecting our customs duties as provided by law. Those are repealed absolutely after the 1st day of July, 1885, and all fees now assessable by law are repealed after the same date; and yet there is no provision whatever in this bill which suggests even that the collectors, deputy collectors, surveyors, &c., at the various ports shall receive any compensation for their services. It is a matter of fact under existing law that most of these officers are now paid by fees. The clause before us wipes out every vestige of these fees and repeals the law which provides a fund to pay the officers, and yet provides nothing in its place.

Is that a wise thing for us to do? I submit to the Senate that this is a most crude provision attempting to strike down what has existed in this Government since 1789 and putting in its place absolutely nothing, except devolving on the President of the United States the whole power to do as he chooses with reference to the external and internal commerce of our country so far as establishing ports of entry and ports of delivery is concerned.

Mr. SLATER. I desire to say a word or two in relation to this proposition inasmuch as reference has been made particularly to my own State and to a circumstance that, in my judgment, gives a better understanding (at least it does to me) of the effect of this measure than any mere statement would without a knowledge of the circumstance.

It must be understood, I presume, by every Senator that the Secretary of the Treasury can not of himself know personally the business relations of every locality that may aspire to be a port of entry or a port of delivery in the United States. He must be informed of all the facts and circumstances of the business through Treasury agents who will be sent to far distant sections of the country to ascertain those things and report.

It so happened in Oregon, I suppose—I do not know the fact, but I presume it must have been so—that some Treasury agent was instructed to report the conditions in relation to custom-houses and ports of entry in Oregon. A report was made. Now, what do we find? This recommendation is that we shall be practically reduced to one port of entry of Oregon, a State of 95,000 square miles, with a large extent of seacoast and many rival towns and sections. Such a report could not have been made by any person who lived in Oregon and knew the situation there. It was utterly impracticable. It was made and, as has been said, adopted by the Secretary. As soon as he received this report the member of the House from Oregon and others interested set to work to counteract it, and, as I remarked to the Senator from Kentucky, we had great trouble in getting a letter from the Secretary correcting the mistake he had fallen into. Now, as we understand, the total number was increased from sixty-seven to sixty-nine to meet this mistake, and yet I am now informed by the Senator from Iowa that one of this increase only was intended for Oregon and one for somewhere else.

Now, if we pass this law as the House has sent it to the Senate, and the Secretary sits down to rearrange the customs districts, how do we know that some of those districts designated to be consolidated will not be omitted or that a greater blunder perhaps has been made than he made in some part of Massachusetts, than was made in Oregon? Then Oregon goes without either one of the restored districts intended for her. It is fair to assume that if a mistake was made in Oregon and a mistake was made in Massachusetts, a dozen such mistakes equally as great, equally as necessary to be rectified, will be shown before these customs districts can be readjusted.

I agree entirely with the Senator from Iowa, that it is placing too much power in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury to give him the complete handling of all the customs collection districts in the United States. There is no comparison between the two systems, the internal-revenue system and the customs system. The business is different. A very much larger proportion of the community have business relations with the customs officers than with the internal-revenue districts. But a small portion of the people practically have business to transact with the internal-revenue officers or are affected by them, but go into the seaport towns and seaport States of the country and you will find that a very large volume of the business of the country, all the import business, all the export business, all the coastwise business, all the shipbuilding business is connected directly with the custom-houses. We are overturning a well-settled system and trying a system that we have nothing but theory to justify, and the very first effort showed that it involved mistakes and blundering and misapprehensions and misunderstandings, and it must inevitably do so.

I shall stand by the report of the committee on this proposition.

Mr. HAWLEY. I second the remarks of the Senator from Oregon. They apply mutatis mutandis to my own State.

I judge from these suggestions of the Secretary of the Treasury that he proposes to make two districts instead of five in my own State. Now, I know that that can not be done without very serious damage to the importing and manufacturing interests of the State. I suppose he wishes to abolish the customs district at Middletown, which is really the district of Hartford. Since the Treasury Department has been so kind as to extend some facilities to us in the matter of transporting goods in bond, and has established a bonded warehouse for us, the revenues at Middletown are rapidly increasing. They were $37,000 last year; they will run from $60,000 to $65,000 this year, and will continue to increase. From information received from merchants and manufacturers I am sure the collections will be over $100,000 in the next fiscal year. That custom-house the Secretary proposes to abolish, and I suppose transfer the duties thereof to New Haven, which, by land, is twenty or twenty-five miles away, and by water—I speak without precise recollection—some sixty miles. Our manufacturers in a wide region of country above Middletown have lately been felicitating themselves that the Treasury has granted what they have been desiring for many years. It is a very great accommodation to us, a considerable saving in money. Their goods come to New York and are sent without breaking bulk to Hartford, where the goods are appraised and the duties paid.

I know I speak the sentiment of all the people of my State interested when I say that the consolidation proposed will be a great injury. I can imagine some possible reductions and I can imagine a consolidation that would work no very serious injury; and if the Treasury Department will submit to us a substitute for the long and detailed statute in the Revised Statutes referred to by the Senator from Iowa and designating the districts to be abolished or consolidated, so that we can discuss them in detail, we could probably come to an agreement upon a reasonable reduction; but I am utterly unwilling to consent to the meat-ax surgery in this bill, and give this extraordinary discretion to the Treasury Department.

The Senator from Oregon supposed that the number of districts proposed under the consolidation, being originally sixty-seven, were increased from sixty-seven to sixty-nine to accommodate Oregon. He learns now that one of those two added is another district in some other State, and so he wants the number named in the bill to be seventy. I want the number to be at least seventy-two; some other Senator wants it to be seventy-three or seventy-four; and so we go on. Possibly if the Secretary of the Treasury would send us the draught of a bill that we could discuss outside of an appropriation bill, we might cut the one hundred and thirty-five districts down to one hundred or one hundred and twenty-five. I suppose under his suggestions here that while he would give us but two customs districts in Connecticut he might oblige us with one or two or three ports of entry, but I could only hope it. I do not know it.

I emphatically stand by the committee. I can conceive no scheme of this character that ought to have our approval. I want an independent bill and a fair discussion of its details. I am unwilling to abdicate all my legislative power and duty in regard to this important matter.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, it is a very rare thing that the Senate sees so plain and marked an instance of the unwisdom of the policy of putting general legislation of an important kind on an appropriation bill as this experiment affords. Here is a great system that was elaborated ninety years ago with the extremest care, in which the subdivisions of the country were regarded, and which from time to time, as our territory has increased and our seacoast has expanded, has been adapted to the necessities of the public service and to the collections of the revenues of the Government; and in the waning days of a long session, with no indication even that the committee in charge of it has given much time or consideration to it, the whole thing is sought to be obliterated, struck from the statute-book, where it occupies fifty pages, and in a few provisions in an appropriation bill a complete overturning and upsetting and revolution is attempted; and this great measure, fraught with such effects as may naturally follow, is sent to the Senate and comes in here at a time which many Senators hope is within ten days of the end of the session, and we are asked, the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, with 10,000 subjects-matter to consider—I do not exaggerate—sitting day and night, is asked to consider and pass upon, and if need be amend (for in order to consider you have got to have the power to amend), such a vast proposition as this.

Confronted by that situation the Committee on Appropriations did what it has been sustained in doing time and time again by Senators upon both sides of this Chamber, struck out this provision of the bill, declaring that there was no opportunity to consider it and that it ought not to find place upon this legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which is simply an appropriation bill for the running expenses of the Government for the next fiscal year. That statement of the case, incomplete as I have made it, ought to dispose of this amendment, and the Senate ought to set its face rigidly against any such efforts to bring such subjects-matter before this body at this late day.

If this is so good a measure, if it has been elaborated elsewhere so soundly, why is it that the Department has not seen to it that proper bills have been introduced and referred to the proper committees, who can study the subject week in and week out and report a measure with the authority of a committee that has jurisdiction over the great subject of the commerce of the country entering into its ports and the collection of the revenues there? Why is it that a body—I will not refer to it by name—has sat here for six or seven months, and only at the last, tail-end of the session sent in such a measure as this is on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill? Why, sir, if that is to be done, if that is to be tolerated, if it shall be borne by the Senate, the most significant legislation that could come before Congress may be kept in the committee-rooms until the last month of the session and then hurried before this body on the appropriation bills and we be obliged on a five-minute debate—for we can not give much more time than that to these last appropriation bills—to consider every subject-matter.

The Senate has just voted down, most properly, a provision put on here in reference to the internal revenue, and I can not imagine that any different result will follow here. Nor would I under any conditions—and I am not going to elaborate what has been so much better said than I can say it—when this is done intrust any of this discretion either to the Secretary of the Treasury or to the President of the United States. It does not belong there. The division and subdivision of the Union into great and small collection districts that shall collect the revenues of the country, which are laid by acts of Congress and which are collected by a force supplied by Congress, is a thing that this body and the House at the other end of the Capitol ought always to take faithfully into mind and consider and elaborate and bring forth the results of. I am free to say, Mr. President, that no Secretary of the Treasury, whether he has sat in his seat one year, or three years, or five years, or eight years, simply receiving the reports of his special agents and subordinates, who traverse the country, in reference to these things, can be so well informed on this great subject as the Congress of the American people coming from all the States, representing all the interior and the seaboard. It is a power, it is a discretion that never should be abandoned to any other department of the Government; and there has been nothing done this session in the way of attempted legislation that strikes at the power which should lie in the two Houses equally with this project that is put onto this appropriation bill.

Now, as to the details, I am not going into them, because I am not going to weary the Senate. I was struck with what the Senator from Oregon said about the likelihood, the necessity even as has been shown, of mistakes occurring in any plan that any Secretary may present here. Take the argument that was read by the Senator from Kentucky, that districts ought to be consolidated because no revenue is collected. I would like to see any man, no matter how wise he may be and no matter how gifted he may be, undertake to administer the Treasury Department and collect the revenues of the Government with only a few custom-houses where duties are collected and where the revenues gather together and are received and paid. The moment you adopt that system and only have a custom-house where duties are collected, then for every dollar that you will save in the salaries of honest and vigilant officials at the small custom-houses, where no duties are collected, you will lose a thousand dollars in the falling off of the revenues in the great custom-houses.

From Quoddy Head in Maine all around our border in the interior to the Canada line, along the coast and along the Southern States, or along the Gulf, or along the Pacific coast, there is not a single custom-house, no matter whether a dollar is collected or not, that does not tend to force the customs right into the great custom-houses. By their safeguards against smuggling, against a thousand infractions of the revenue laws that always have a charm for enterprising and ingenious men on the border, by the scrutiny and by the public sentiment that they raise against what is called smuggling, the small custom-houses sent the duties unerringly into the great custom-houses. Abolish them or cut down their importance and substitute nothing but tide-waiters and inspectors, remove that public sentiment which is made by the collectors of the smaller customs-districts, and smuggling will spring up everywhere, in every nook, in every corner, upon every little bay, and your revenues will fall off a thousand dollars in New York, Boston, and San Francisco where you save one in the pay of officers.

This system was not devised without some wisdom; it was not devised without considering these things; and the argument is not worth one penny that says you shall only have custom-houses where duties are collected.

I have been looking over the details in my own State of this plan of the Secretary of the Treasury. There is upon my State a seacoast, following the indendations, where vessels can go of 1,500 miles. There is a land border of seven hundred or eight hundred miles besides. It is formed by nature as an invitation and as an incentive to the smuggler. It is the kind of coast that in England or Ireland would harbor in every bay and every cove and every estuary of a river a haunt of smuggling. It stretches on the land, as I have said, hundreds and hundreds of miles, and in the wisdom of the fathers there have been placed along every hundred miles, sometimes less than that, a custom-house, with the responsibilities and duties of a custom-house and with a collector at the head. What is the result? The smuggling that is done there is a trifle. I do not say this on my own authority; go to the Department and find officially not only what they know, but what they suspect, and they will tell you that it is a bagatelle. Smuggling is not fashionable; public sentiment is against it. Why? Because in every one of these collectorships, ranging along from fifty to one hundred miles in space, the head of the office is the first man in his community; he is a man of character; he is a man of standing; he is a man of probity; he is a man who makes public sentiment; he is not simply a tide-waiter; he is not simply a paid official who depends merely upon what he gets as a salary from day to day as a subordinate, but he is a man who is wont to lead his community, and he and his influence make smuggling unfashionable, and it does not grow up.

Now, cut down these custom-houses and put only two or three, or whatever the Secretary may prescribe, all along that coast, and all along the wooded frontier, and you have nothing but deputies and inspectors and the lower kind of officers, and the moral force that is thrown about this service by the men who are at the head of it ceases, and smuggling grows up at every corner, at every place. I have studied the subject. I used to think myself that a consolidation might be beneficial. I am satisfied it would be disastrous.

Does the Secretary save anything? Applying this to this one instance that I am giving, he blots out these custom-houses, he builds up two or three others and adds immensely to their force, and instead of saving any large sum of money the difference between his list and the list as it is now is not $3,000; and I venture to say that if that plan is set on foot and is adopted, in five years from now, where there is a dollar of smuggled goods that now comes into the State of Maine, either on its seaboard or on its frontier in the forest, there will be a hundred. The officers who are sought to be abolished are men who give attention to their duties; they are men who know of the services that are required not only by themselves but by their subordinates, and to-day it is the wonder of the world that, exposed as the United States is on her northern boundary, all along the Pacific, all along the Atlantic and Gulf coast, that the amount of smuggling is so small. The system at present is a good one, not a perfect one, and we shall never get a perfect one, but it is a good one, and there is no sense in rudely assailing it as it is assailed by this proposal.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, following in the line of argument of the Senator from Maine, I merely wish to add an illustration in the case of New Jersey. The proposition is there to cut out four of the oldest collection districts in this country established between the Delaware Bay and the port of New York. These custom-houses were established not for the entries made, not for the importations; but simply to prohibit smuggling and for the purpose of enrolling vessels. At two of these points of prominence, Great Egg Harbor and Little Egg Harbor, you can see at any one time from one hundred to two hundred vessels sailing along the coast. These vessels do not enter there, they do not discharge their cargoes there; but there is a great passageway between the Delaware Bay and New York, between the North and the South; the European vessels coming in strike the light of Absecom near by before entering the ports of the Delaware or New York, and there is an absolute necessity for the protection of our customs interests that there should be custom-houses along this line. The breaking up of those ports of entry would leave an exposed coast for one hundred and seventy-five miles open to the smuggler, as suggested by the Senator from Maine.

I trust the proposition will not be entertained.

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. President, the legislation in regard to custom-houses and ports of entry which is incorporated in the Revised Statutes is a compilation of acts of Congress adopted from time to time from the origin of the Government down to the period of the revision of the laws; so that nearly every custom-house in the United States was created by a separate act of Congress. We have established a considerable number of ports of entry since the revision of the statutes. Now the proposition is by this provision in an appropriation bill to sweep away this legislation of nearly a century and to put in the place of it the arbitrary exercise or discretionary exercise of power on the part of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. The proposition, as has been well said, is an amazing one to be incorporated in an appropriation bill.

While I do not feel disposed to differ with the Secretary of the Treasury in the ideas entertained by him that by appropriate legislation some changes may be introduced in this respect to promote economy, I beg entirely to differ with him in the suggestion which induced him to liken this to the case of the collection of the internal revenues.

Custom-houses and ports of entry are not established solely for the purpose of collecting revenues as the districts of internal revenue are. A custom-house, a port of entry, is not established for the mere purpose of collecting revenue any more than a post-office is established on the frontier for the purpose of collecting revenue or a school-house is established in a new country for the purpose of collecting revenue. These customs districts and ports of entry are established for the encouragement of commerce, and for the spread of improvement along our ocean coasts.

Let me illustrate, Mr. President. Since the revision of the laws to which I have referred, and since I have had the honor of a seat on this floor, we have established a port of entry at Newport News in Virginia, on the bay opposite Norfolk, in that State, and what has been the result? I was there in October last, and found there had been erected there by the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company, mainly by capital furnished by the city of New York as I was informed, a storehouse into which the railroad cars ran to unload their cargoes and products upon steamers, and to receive from steamers their cargoes to be carried along the line of the road. A large elevator which transfers by steam the products of the country to and from the boats had also been constructed. It is one of the largest, if not the largest, elevator in the United States. So that, in my judgment, the advantages to commerce at this port are not excelled, if they are equaled, at any point upon the entire Atlantic coast. Neither Boston nor New York nor Philadelphia nor Baltimore can furnish such facilities as are furnished there. The expenditure must have reached millions.

Now what did this bill propose? It proposed not only to abolish all these collection districts, to give to the President the authority to reduce them to the number of sixty-nine, but to give to the President also the authority to designate the ports of entry in all such districts. He may say that Newport News shall no longer be a port of entry, and then what would become of this vast investment of capital? Since Newport News was established as a port of entry the post-office at that place which before hardly paid for keeping its doors open has become a Presidential office. It is such rapid development and progress which this legislation facilitates and encourages in the country. It is a narrow, a very narrow and imperfect view to take of this subject of legislation to treat it as a mere matter of collecting revenue. That, it is true, is one of the incidents. These custom-houses, really in the more scattered portions of the country, and where but a small portion of the revenues are collected, are practically, as has been suggested, a part of the detective force of the Government Treasury to prevent smuggling. They are like the secret agents of the Treasury, of which we once had fifty-three in number. In the Forty-fourth Congress the Democratic party struck out the entire list, and it was only by strife that I was enabled to save ten of the number in the House bill which was increased to twenty in the Senate and agreed to in conference committee. I think the number has since been increased by adding eight more.

I would as soon think of leaving a marshal or a sheriff without his posse comitatus as to take away from the Treasury Department these means of protecting the revenues against fraud.

In any aspect in which we can view this subject, Mr. President, it seems to me this legislation as it was proposed in this bill would be unwise, even if it came here on the recommendation of the proper committee of the Senate or of the other House. But to undertake to do this upon an appropriation bill without any facts before us, without anything upon which we can intelligently act in respect to it, it seems to me is a very extraordinary proposition. If the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury is worthy of consideration, as I think it is, let it, as has been suggested and as recommended by him, come before us in a bill properly prepared. Let it go to the Committee on Commerce which has the whole subject committed to its consideration under our rules, and when a bill reaches us with the recommendation and report of that committee, we shall have the facts upon which we can judge as to the propriety of what is proposed.

But here is nothing but a mere arbitrary fiat of an appropriations committee wiping out this whole scheme of legislation by the Government, and remitting the entire collection of the customs of the country and the whole policy of the commercial regulations and relations of the country to the arbitrary exercise of discretion by the President and Secretary of the Treasury. I am quite sure that no such proposition can receive the sanction of the Senate.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I suppose from the amount of opposition developed to the proposed House provision that anything I may say will not go very far toward retaining it, but I am a good deal astonished at hearing gentlemen all around me say this is a new subject which they have not had time to consider. We have been considering it for more than ten years, and Secretary after Secretary has recommended it. Not only has the consolidation of these districts down to the number needed to transact the public business been recommended, but the expensiveness, the uselessness of great numbers that are kept up has been pointed out, and the system under which all the employés are now paid has been condemned by every Secretary of the Treasury and has been condemned by a vote of the Senate twice, I believe, unanimously, and yet we are told now that we are going to overthrow the whole legislation of the country concerning customs from Congress and create an autocracy in the hands of one man, if we venture to make the consolidation in the mode here proposed. The Secretary of the Treasury has set forth the case in great detail, and taken pains to show how the reduction of districts can be done and how little damage or inconvenience it will be to any interest, how much it will save to the country and how much it will improve the system; and yet because it is assumed that the members of Congress know so much more than the Secretary we are to reject it, and fix each line of each district by statute, when we know nothing about it and some gentlemen say they have not had time to look at the subject at all.

The Secretary has laid this matter before us year after year, and in the volume I hold in my hand he has, so that every Senator and every Representative could see it, taken the pains to make maps of the whole country showing the old districts and designating the new districts. Here is the map for Maine, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and the eastern seaboard [exhibiting], with full explanations of the existing condition, the changes that are proposed, the improvements expected to be made by the change, and so on; then New York, New Jersey, and Virginia, and so on. Here is map after map, and explanations of every one of them. The plan has been considered not only by committees of the two Houses, but has now met the approval of the House of Representatives after full consideration, and that legislation is now sent to us thus recommended and we are told that we are overthrowing long-established precedents if we attempt to interfere with the miserable, wasteful, useless, and corrupt system now existing.

This subject has been before us time and again, till it ought to be familiar to all. Ten years ago this matter was pressed by the then Secretary of the Treasury upon the attention of Congress. I hold in my hand a speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES], then chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, to which I referred a while ago, in which he set forth the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury and in which he presented urgent reasons why this consolidation should be had and why these changes ought to be made. My recollection is that it passed the House of Representatives then almost as unanimously as it has passed that body now. The Senator from Massachusetts in that speech, and it was a very able one, by the way—I commend it to gentlemen on the other side—delivered on the 12th of February, 1874, over ten years ago, said:

I have here a full list of all the ports—

Referring to the finance report of the Secretary of the Treasury—

in which will be seen those which do not pay their expenses—ports at which a watchman with a salary of a few hundred dollars a year can prevent smuggling, and will meet all the needs of the Government. The expenses drawn from the Treasury to maintain these twenty-nine ports are $344,685. The list in detail is as follows, and I call the special attention of members to it.

And among others—and perhaps that is what excited the ire of the Senator from Maine—are fourteen districts in Maine where the aggregate compensation was $213,822, with one hundred and ninety-four employés, and at one of them, Frenchman's Bay, $24.68 was collected; at Machias, $194.46; at Wiscasset, $54.60; at Bath, $11,527.15, and so on; these were set forth in great detail. None of those paid their expenses, and the recommendation was made ten years ago by the Secretary of the Treasury that the number should be reduced; it has been pressed with more or less earnestness ever since, and recommended by every Secretary.

In the State of Maine, I observe in a speech made in the House of Representatives by a colleague of my own, Mr. THOMPSON, on the 21st of June, 1882, the same tables, only more in detail, were set forth, and in York, Frenchman's Bay, Waldoborough, Machias, Saco, Wiscasset, Belfast, Castine, and Kennebunk, in Maine, there were forty-four officers. Their pay for wages was $26,928, and the cost of public buildings was $137,659.80, and the total collections were $4,217.64.

There is one set forth at Evansville, Ind., by Mr. THOMPSON, where there is not a dollar collected; yet there is a public building there which cost $234,423.89 noted as a building for a custom-house.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Is it occupied by the post-office?

Mr. BECK. It is stated as having been erected as a custom-house. I do not know whether it is occupied for other purposes or not. I think it was at Evansville where the condition existed as set forth in the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts. Somebody sent him a letter which I said I would refer to; I have it now. I believe it came from Evansville. The Senator from Massachusetts read it to the House and it made an impression on me at the time. It reads as follows:

In 1870 Congress passed a law containing a section making —— and quite a number of cities in the West, ports of entry. They had been ports of delivery for years. A previous act had made other places ports of entry, and all of them were about a dozen. In March, 1871, I was appointed appraiser of merchandise at this port. This was a new office at $3,000 a year. When I received that appointment I told ——— ———, who was my Senator, that it was a sinecure. I afterward told the Secretary of the Treasury to the same effect; and a year ago the present month I informed my other Senator that the law should be repealed and the office abolished. Well, an office-holder who expresses such sentiments about his own position is decidedly unpopular in the Republican party [laughter], and in March last I was removed, for what cause I have never been informed, but I presume the charge was insanity. [Laughter.] There could be no charge of neglect or incompetency, for no officer was ever more faithful and diligent in drawing his salary than I was during those two years, and absolutely there was nothing else to do. [Laughter.]

Seriously, while members of Congress are talking about retrenchment and economy, let them abolish these twelve useless offices and save $40,000 per annum, for their blank books and forms (which are not used) amount to a considerable sum. Will you give this subject your attention?

Truly, your friend.

——— ———.

I remember that was given by the Senator as a specimen case. That was in the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts ten years ago, so that this is not a new question; and the Secretary of the Treasury has renewed the recommendation constantly for ten years asking for the abolition of these useless custom-houses. No man can read the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and the investigations he has made and the maps he has had drawn and presented, and all the information he has given to Congress, without being entirely satisfied that the House of Representatives would have come short of its duty if it had not taken the step it did and inserted this measure somewhere. I regret that it is on an appropriation bill. I have opposed legislation on appropriation bills as much as any man, and I would not have inserted it in the bill if I had been in the House; but it is here, and being here we have to deal with it. We have nothing to do with and can make no points of order on their methods; the subject is now before us, and the question is, is it right or is it wrong that we should consolidate these districts?

The Secretary has told us, former Secretaries have told us, indeed, they have all told us, that they can prevent smuggling just as well without this machinery of collectors, appraisers, and civil establishments at these ports where they are collecting nothing as they can with them. The ships can be cleared, licensed, and registered, and all the facilities given to shipping and exporting and importing as easily and as absolutely by deputies who have facilities, without all the machinery of custom-house appliances; and the Senator from Maine must know that smuggling can be prevented just as well with an efficient man at these places as it can by a civil establishment costing $200,000. Men who go into the business of smuggling are not detected at custom-houses. We have 3,000 miles perhaps along the Canadian line between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans not guarded by custom-houses; we have a line along the Mexican border of perhaps 2,000 miles hardly guarded at all except by the revenue agents of the Government; we have the coast of the Pacific with only two or three ports where there are custom-houses. When men go to smuggling they do not carry brass bands; they do not march up to the custom-houses and advise them of what they are going to do. They seek out-of-the-way places, as far remote from custom-houses as possible where the revenue is collected; they seek the bayous and the inlets. The custom-houses do not aid in any regard in preventing that any more than, indeed, not as much as, other machinery now in use or that can be used would do without all this expensive custom-house machinery. Therefore there is no effort to break down the security of the revenues, no effort to impair the efficiency of the service by reducing the customs districts.

Mr. VANCE. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him if the effect of this amendment recommended by the Secretary would be to abolish any point on the coast as a port of entry?

Mr. BECK. No, sir.

Mr. VANCE. So that persons who desire to enter a cargo will have sufficient machinery remaining to do it?

Mr. BECK. The Secretary distinctly says that all the machinery necessary to give every facility exists and that a deputy collector at these points can do all that the present machinery does. He can get along better by getting clear of the intricate machinery now required.

All that he sets forth with great clearness and great distinctness. But the struggle is and has been and always will be to keep in power and position great masses of men who do not come to Congress for their pay, and that is the worst part of it. We are engaged now in almost as great a farce as the post-route bill we used solemnly to pass, of 150 pages, of making a post-route from Brown's Cross-Roads to Ivy Mills. We are now going seriously through a bill of one hundred and odd pages, cutting down the wages of charwomen and clerks here and there, when all the flood-gates are open in the great customs collection districts of the country, drawing from the tax-payers to the amount of six or seven or eight million dollars of permanent appropriations annually that Congress never sees, and about which we know nothing and seem to care less.

I know the importance of time now, and I know that I have taken more of it perhaps than I ought in this regard, but the Senator from Iowa is so terribly afraid of the Secretary of the Treasury doing something enormously wrong with this discretion if we place it in his hands. He knows, and he was one of the gentlemen earnestly in favor of it, I believe, that we gave authority to the Secretary of the Treasury and the President to change the internal collection districts and to reduce them quite as much in proportion as the House now proposes to do in regard to the customs districts, and they did reduce them from one hundred and twenty-six to eighty-four, and they are doing their work as well and as efficiently, as is now admitted, with the eighty-four districts as they did with the one hundred and twenty-six.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator from Kentucky permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I desire to know if any considerable increase in the customs districts of this country has been made since 1860 to the present time?

Mr. BECK. I should have to look over the record to see.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I say there has not been.

Mr. BECK. I am not prepared to say; but at that time and before much of the work of exporting and importing that was done was in small sailing vessels; now the great bulk of our commerce is carried on by great steamship lines. Many offices were established under the old sailing-vessel system, then offices of considerable importance, but now, by the concentration of railroads at the great ports, business being transacted through great iron steamship companies, those small ports have lost their importance and are no longer ports where return cargoes come. The Senator from Florida understands that one of the great reasons why the concentration of commerce is so great at the port of New York is that the return cargoes, the immigrants, and a thousand things that come to a great port that never come to a small one furnish a return cargo to vessels, and that tends to concentrate business at the great port of New York more and more every year.

The difficulty we have with many of the Southern ports is not that we can not send goods abroad as cheaply but because the ships that go from these ports can get nothing to come back with, or so little that they can not afford to carry as cheaply as they can to and from New York. Hence conditions are changing; and when conditions change, then as prudent men we ought to change our legislation to correspond with them, and not keep up places that twenty, thirty, or forty years ago may have been important points, but which are now absolutely unimportant, because they were at one time important.

I was going on to say that if the internal-revenue districts can be changed, why can not the customs districts? The collectors of internal revenue and their subordinates ramify the whole country. Every man who sells a cigar, every man who makes one, every man who retails tobacco, beer, spirits, or wine of any sort, is subject to inspection; the internal-revenue officers are at every man's door, infinitely more so than the customs officers, for the customs officers are confined to the great custom-houses at the ports of entry where the great masses of people never see them; and yet the internal-revenue districts were consolidated from one hundred and twenty-six down to eighty-four, not only with no detriment, but with great advantage to the public service, and Congress was not consulted, because Congress said to the President and Secretary we will pass a law authorizing you to do it; but we are told that Congress knows better how to change a customs district than the Secretary does. With all due respect to the Senator from Iowa, I would say that is almost ridiculous. The Secretary has agents all over the country, ramifying every part of it, reporting to him their condition every day. We could with far more reason profess to know all about the internal-revenue districts than about the customs districts. Our chances to obtain information are far better.

What does any one of us know, what do I know about the customs districts in my State? How can I know, how can any Senator know what the business is at any point unless he goes to the books of the custom-house and ascertains all the ramifications of the business? Much less can any one of us know what is going on in distant States and say this shall be a customs district, and that shall be maintained now because it existed in 1860, especially when the Secretary says, with his knowledge from information on the subject, received from all the collectors of the revenue, that twenty-two or twenty-three districts do not pay a dollar, that thirty-five more do not pay their expenses, and that he can consolidate them and save from half a million to a million and a half. It must be equally clear that Congress ought to pay these officials a salary to take charge of these districts and not allow them to be paid by allowances out of permanent appropriations and fines and penalties and other things that we know nothing about. We ought to retain their compensation in the same condition as all the other civil employés of the Government who are paid by appropriation bills annually submitted to Congress. That done, we will have a system where men who do the work will be properly paid, and men who do nothing but are supernumeraries will be discharged. That is what the House proposition amounts to in regard to this great subject.

I assert again that the power to consolidate the internal-revenue districts operated upon more people, ten to one, and reached the heart of the whole country far more extensively than would the consolidation of the customs districts; and yet that was done, and done without injury, indeed to the great advantage of the country, cutting off numbers of employés and a great number of supernumeraries who were of no value to the service; and this reduction can be made and will be done safely and properly, unless the Senate strikes out the provision which the House has inserted in this bill.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, the argument of the Senator from Kentucky, if there is anything in it, would apply with just as much force to the Post-Office Department as it does to the custom-house system.

Mr. BECK. It does; and we allow the Postmaster-General to put on service on every public road where he desires. That is done.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The Senator from Kentucky fortunately lives in a State where there is not much need for customs districts, although I presume he has his share of internal-revenue organizations.

The customs districts, let me say to the Senator, never were organized on a self-sustaining principle. I have been in the Senate now for nine years, and I do not remember any increase in those districts. It is possible that their commerce may have fallen off, but those who live on the seaboard and comprehend the wants of their people know very well the necessity for those districts to facilitate commerce between the States wherein they exist and the countries with which we trade. In my State, for example, with an immense seaboard and depending almost entirely upon exports for the support of our people, I do not think there is a single port of entry that ought to be abolished, notwithstanding there are quite a number of places where the income of the office does not meet the expenses required to maintain it. But that is no argument. The people want facilities for sending their goods abroad.

Under this power proposed to be given to the Secretary of the Treasury he can abolish custom-house after custom-house in every State at his discretion without the representatives of the people who are interested in business knowing whether his action is right in the effects or not. I am not going to vote for any such proposition. I say that this is a legislative power and not an executive power. If you propose to reorganize the customs districts of the country, let the Committee on Commerce bring in the bill and designate in it the changes proposed to be made.

All the customs districts now existing have been fixed by law and not by the Executive, and the clause which the committee has stricken out proposes to give to the President, not the power to execute the law, but to change a pre-existing law that Congress enacted designating the boundaries of customs districts and fixing the number of custom-houses in the respective States.

I say Congress has no business to delegate this power to the President. The representatives of the people and the States are deeply concerned in this subject, and I know that the people of my State are as much concerned in having custom-houses and ports of entry there as they are in having post-offices, the medium by which intelligence can be distributed. If you give this power to the President, exercising it upon the representation of local officers, what guarantee have you that it will be wisely executed? Every district is represented in Congress by a person who is presumed to know the wants of his people. It is not entirely a Federal affair; it is an eminently local affair. I think there have been one or two petitions from my State since I have been here asking for a new port of entry with privileges where the people could clear vessels, because otherwise they would have to go to remote ports in order to get a cargo out. Will it be said that because these little offices do not pay all that the Government ought to get from them the people are to be deprived of the advantages of sending out their products to foreign countries and to have to go one hundred or two hundred miles to clear a vessel? My colleague knows the case of Tampa, a little port it is true on the Gulf, but it has a commerce with Cuba. Before we succeeded in establishing a port of clearance there, these people had to go to Key West, two or three hundred miles off, to clear or discharge a vessel, and a large portion of the people are dependent upon the exportation of cattle for support. Because that office does not pay a large sum of money in the way of duties on imports, it is to be abolished or the authority is to be given to the Secretary of the Treasury to abolish it. I think that proposition is wrong. If we were legislating on this subject intelligently, I think Congress ought to exercise this power. It is a legislative power. The organic law says that Congress shall exercise the legislative power, and not the Executive:

The President is hereby authorized and directed to consolidate and reorganize the customs collection districts of the United States on or before the 1st day of October, 1884, so that the same shall not exceed in number sixty-nine.

Is that an executive power?

The President shall fix the boundaries of such reorganized districts and designate ports of entry therein.

He is to designate the ports of entry. What guarantee have you that that power will be exercised wisely? Have not the representatives of the people and of the States wherein there is a single port of entry now established a right to be heard on this subject before Congress before a change is made? They will not be heard if this becomes a law, because it will be done after star-chamber fashion behind the doors of the Treasury. The first thing you will know a half a dozen ports of entry will be abolished and the whole system of commerce in the States revolutionized, and the conveniences that they now enjoy taken away. I am opposed to the proposition.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Mr. President, I have not the slightest idea that this proposition of the House will pass the Senate, and I do not propose to take up the time of the Senate in discussing it; but as it affects that part of the country which I in part represent it is proper that I should say something in opposition to it.

The establishment of a port of entry in any part of this country is the exercise of the power to regulate commerce between the United States and foreign states, and that is one of the enumerated powers belonging exclusively to Congress. Even if in its effects this was not a dangerous power, very far-reaching, under the exercise of which the commerce of cities may be destroyed and the business and commerce of other cities or towns adjacent may be built up, I should still be unwilling that Congress should delegate any one of its enumerated powers under the Constitution to an executive officer. It is wrong in principle and it can not but work wrong in practice. There may be too many customs districts in the United States; I believe there are too many.

Mr. BECK. I suppose the Senator from California does not assume that because collection districts are consolidated ports of entry are abolished. Nobody pretends that we are abolishing ports of entry by this. A collection district may have ten ports of entry in it.

Mr. MILLER, of California. This provision in the bill places it in the power of the President of the United States to abolish a collection district utterly and consolidate it with others, or make entirely new districts, as I understand.

Mr. BECK. A change of the collection districts does not involve a change of the ports of entry.

Mr. MILLER, of California. But the port of entry is established when you establish the collection district.

Mr. BECK. There may be ten different ports of entry in one collection district. There are half a dozen in some of them.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I know of no instance in the United States where there is more than one port of entry in a collection district. Each port of entry with a certain area of country about it is a collection district. That is the law as far as I know the law. I do not know of a single instance where there are two ports of entry in a collection district. The power to abolish or consolidate collection districts necessarily gives the power to abolish ports of entry; at least that is my construction of it.

As I began to say, I think perhaps there may be too many customs districts in the United States, but we are not able to determine that here and now, and it is unsafe and unwise in my opinion to delegate the power to change these collection districts, to abolish some and build up others, to the President of the United States, which in effect is to the Secretary of the Treasury, and he gets his information from special agents.

If you enact this legislation you will have the spectacle of collection districts and ports of entry being changed and abolished and new ones established on the reports of special agents, who are subordinate officers of the Treasury, who are governed and controlled, as we all know, by considerations sometimes personal, sometimes pecuniary, but on the whole a somewhat unreliable body of officers of this Government. They desire to magnify their own office, to exercise power, to punish enemies, to build up friends, and they are the men who are to give the information upon which the Secretary of the Treasury is to make out his schedule of collection districts and report it to the President under this bill.

Congress had better hold this power in its own hands and exercise it here, as it is competent to do, in the interest of the Government and the interest of the people. The Senators and Representatives in Congress are the certificated agents of the people, and are presumed to best know what is for the interest of the Government and the people in respect of these collection districts and these ports of entry; and it is not safe to place the subject in the control of any man, much less in the power of a corps of special agents, to break down the commerce and business and shipping interests of any particular place and build up those of another.

Such a proposition ought never to have come to the Senate in an appropriation bill. Such a proposition ought never to be considered upon an appropriation bill. If we are to consider this question let it come in the shape of a bill from the proper committee, the Committee on Commerce of the Senate. Let them look into it and then give us the opportunity here of debate and to represent what are the interests and the wishes and the desires and the necessities of the people in the different districts of this country.

On the Pacific coast we have a great and growing commerce. We have four collection districts in the State of California. By this plan of the Secretary of the Treasury one of these collection districts is to be abolished, and I know that it ought not to be abolished. It was created by an act of Congress after a full discussion of the subject and a full understanding of it; and it is not a proper thing for the Secretary of the Treasury to abolish that collection district upon his judgment of the matter.

Mr. BECK. The Senator will allow me to suggest to him that I find in section 2568 of the Revised Statutes, in relation to the collection district of New Orleans, after stating what it shall comprise, there are ports of delivery attached to that district, about twenty-five in number, embracing Saint Louis, Mo., Nashville, Tenn., Louisville, Ky., and up as far as Pittsburgh, Pa., and across to Wisconsin, all subject to that port of entry.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Those are ports of delivery.

Mr. BECK. Yes; all ports of delivery, but all subject to that one port of entry.

Mr. MILLER, of California. But they are not ports of entry. The question was how many ports of entry were in a collection district. A port of delivery is not a port of entry. You can not enter or clear vessels at a port of delivery.

Mr. BECK. I think several of these places have been made ports of entry since.

Mr. HALE. There are no cases, or at least very few, where there is more than one port of entry in the same district of collection. There are several instances where there are several ports of delivery in a collection district.

Mr. BECK. May there not be a port of entry where there is no custom-house?

Mr. HALE. Oh, no.

Mr. MILLER, of California. At a port of delivery a vessel may land goods and take in cargo, but duties can not be paid at a port of delivery. Duties are paid at the port of entry.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is under great obligation to me, for I have furnished him with more material upon which to make speeches in the last ten years, I think, than any other friend he has. [Laughter.]

Mr. BECK. I admit that.

Mr. DAWES. If I had known the uses to which they would have been put, perhaps I should not have filled the RECORD with so many as I have made. The Senator has been quoting very liberally from a speech which I made some ten years ago in the other branch upon another subject and referring to a very different measure than this; and the idea that it could have been used to support a proposition like this I think is a discovery for which the Senator is entitled to a great deal of credit, and which I yield to him entirely, and shall set up no claim at all to the idea that the President of the United States is a better law-making power under this Government than the constituted Legislature formed as our fathers made it. I certainly never had any idea that it would contribute even to that which the Senator has so near at heart at this moment, economy of administration, for the representatives of the people to surrender to the Executive not only their constitutional functions but all the knowledge that they derive from their combined deliberation, coming from different parts of the country and representing different interests and filled with a knowledge of the localities from which they came. The Government of the United States was framed upon the idea that the many knew more than the few, and it runs through all our legislation, and not more in anything else than in this very thing.

The Senator has produced a paper which I read to the other branch ten years ago as an evidence of the condition of things to-day. Nothing can be so great a mistake as the idea that the condition of the commerce of the country, the business of the country, the currents and drifts of trade, foreign and domestic, are now what they were ten years ago. I have no doubt now, I did not have then, that the customs districts of the country should be reorganized, and that some of them should be consolidated; but whether there should be less in the aggregate now than then I quite question. The country is vastly greater than it was ten years ago in all that constitutes its commerce, foreign and domestic. All along its border there are new currents of trade and of business, requiring new facilities and the creation of new custom-houses in places like that indicated by the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM] at Newport News.

Why, sir, it is within the memory of the oldest inhabitant that Yorktown, in Virginia, was supposed to be a port of more promise in the then future than New York, and men settling in New York tried to induce residents of Yorktown, Va., to remove to New York under intimations that the future of New York would be greater than that of Yorktown, and they were answered by the fact that goods were imported at that time into Yorktown and from Yorktown taken to New York. Alexandria was but a few years ago more of a port than Baltimore. Newport News was not thought of when Yorktown was supposed to be the finest harbor in the United States. It is idle to think that you can make this system of customs continue just as it is year after year. There is a current of trade to-day in one direction and another in another next year. That must be reached by legislation, and facilities in one place increased while they may be diminished in another. Who knows best how and when and how much and to what extent this legislation is demanded? For what are the representatives of the people assembled but to bring together the various knowledge and experience and wants of the whole people into the form of law? Who ever thought of surrendering to the Executive the functions of the Legislature?

Why, sir, this very proposition was not under consideration in another place a half hour before the scheme of the Secretary of the Treasury was shown to be in some respects and in particular localities so impracticable that it has come to pass that that which he said could be reduced to sixty-seven custom-houses and ports of entry has come into this bill sixty-nine. In two localities, in the half hour that the bill was passing through, the utter impracticability of the scheme that had been suggested at the other end of the Avenue was demonstrated, and two more were added. It could not have been considered there as long as it is being considered here, with the attention of members from different parts of the country drawn to it, but what there would have been found other inconsistencies and impracticabilities in it, besides those found already, to such an extent that it would have been abandoned or modified more and more than it was in going through some other branch than this.

It is the strangest proposition in the world to say that one man, having no experience and practical knowledge of localities or of the currents of trade and the demands of commerce except such as comes to him at the capital, can determine practically with any wisdom what shall be the entire commercial facilities of the country, and what shall be the most effective guards over the revenue of the country.

But, sir, one feature of this case—I have not heard all this debate—I have not heard alluded to. The President of the United States is to revolutionize the entire commercial facilities of this country before the 1st day of October in this year. He is to say whether Boston shall be the only port of entry in New England, or whether Salem shall be and Boston closed; he is to say whether it shall be New York or it shall be Albany; he is to say in any other locality, and he is to say it under the heat and excitement and temptations of a Presidential canvass. He is to exercise upon the great commercial interests of this country a greater power than was ever reposed in the President of the United States before, and he is to exercise it in those three months of the four years of his administration in which he ought never to be tempted to exercise it. I have as much confidence in the Executive as has any other Senator; I have no doubt that he would endeavor to rise above any such considerations as those I have alluded to, but he could not rise above the invitation; he could not rise above the jar; he could not rise above all the malign influences that would grow out of the suspicion. He never should be put to the temptation. If ever the President of the United States should be clothed with such power as is indicated in this measure, he should not be clothed with it now.

I believe in the propriety and it may be the necessity of the reorganization of the customs districts of the United States. I believe it should be the result of careful and patient investigation in the House of Representatives and in this branch, too; it should be the work of mature legislation. There was no such proposition as this in the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury in 1874, to which I called the attention of the House in the speech the Senator from Kentucky has read from. It was a proposition of the Secretary of the Treasury to invite Congress to take up this subject, and take it up, too, with an idea prominently in his mind to which this present proposition is an entire stranger, and the recommendation of it seems to have come from a source that is not that of the other considerations which I should like to read from the Secretary of the Treasury at that time.

I invite the attention of Congress—

Says that Secretary—to the propriety of reorganizing the customs collection districts on the Atlantic coast—

He proposed to try the reorganization of those upon the Atlantic coast first—seventy-nine in number.

He then goes on to state why he thinks they can be changed.

At the same time—

He says—

it must be remembered that the effective administration of the revenue system often requires the services of customs officers at points where few or no duties are collected. The judicious disposition of a force for the prevention of smuggling is indispensable to the collection of the revenue from imports, especially where the extent of coast affords opportunities for the clandestine introduction of dutiable merchandise. I would therefore suggest such action as may lead to a reduction of the number of districts, and a consequent reduction of expenses, without affecting the convenience of importers or the safety of the revenue.

This was the legislation which he invoked from Congress. To such legislation I would give my hearty support to-day as I urged it then. But from that day to this, Congress, fresh every two years from the people, conversant in all localities with the needs and necessities and conveniencies and facilities of commerce, has not found it within the line of its duty to close up at once more than half of the customs districts of the United States, and leave the other half to be designated by the President of the United States without the voice of the representatives of the people confirming or rejecting his views, and to do that in the hurry of three months, and those three months when the entire country shall be convulsed with a Presidential campaign.

There could never have been selected a time so inopportune as there never could have been selected a method so out of keeping with the entire theory and practice and needs of our Government as the one which, without warning to the representatives of the people, was crowded into an appropriation bill and hurried through one branch without opportunity enough except for two members to be able to disclose its inconsistencies and incompatibilities so much that, without opposition, to that extent the scheme was modified and reformed, as it ought to have been from beginning to end by the legislators of the people.

The attempt to carry great measures, whether of reform or otherwise, in appropriation bills is the evil of the hour in legislation in these Halls, and if we yield our conviction of that evil when our partiality for measures is so great as that of the Senator from Kentucky at this moment, we say to each other, "Remember whenever you have a conviction of the wisdom of anything special," like that which the Senator has here, "you are at liberty always to forget the principle that underlies appropriation bills, that they shall be freely considered, item by item, uninfluenced by considerations attached to other measures, and other measures should carry themselves through both branches of the law-making power upon their merits, and not be carried through upon the necessities of appropriations from year to year."

Therefore, sir, I regret that the Senator from Kentucky, who has always been for eliminating general legislation from appropriation bills, except that kind of general legislation to which he is most attached, should not see that he gives up all the principle when he says, "I feel at liberty to depart from it so far as those measures that I think are right are concerned; I will only oppose general legislation in appropriation bills so far as it concerns measures that I disapprove of."

Mr. BECK. One word and I am done. I am utterly unable to understand how we are giving up the power of Congress to legislate over this subject by the proposition which has been submitted to us by the House. We had declared by law, as is very well understood, that there should be one hundred and twenty-five or one hundred and thirty custom districts in the United States. We had declared by law that there should be one hundred and twenty-six internal-revenue collection districts in the United States. We caused an investigation to be made into the use for this number of internal-revenue collection districts in the United States, and we said to the President upon this investigation that he ought to cut them down to eighty-four, and he did so cut them down, and there are eighty-four now. He has no right to change to a smaller number nor increase above what we ordered. We regulate that by law, but the details of how it should be done were submitted to the President of the United States.

Now we have, say, one hundred and thirty customs districts in the United States. We called on the Secretary of the Treasury for an exhibit in relation to them, and he reported that twenty of them were paying nothing and that thirty were not paying expenses; that there were altogether too many; and we directed an investigation to be made as to how many could be dispensed with. The Secretary, in obedience to the order of Congress, did make that investigation, and gave the result of it in his last report. He says to us, "There are fifty or sixty districts that I have no use for and that the country does not require. The number ought to be cut down; they have become useless by the changes of trade." He has furnished to Congress maps of the old districts and the new districts, and how they should be modified and changed, and how sixty-nine can be made ample for all purposes. All that has been laid before Congress by order of Congress; and now the House of Representatives proposes to us, after the investigation has been made and the maps made of the new districts suggested in lieu of the old, to embody in this bill authority to carry out the measure.

Who then is taken by surprise? Report after report has been made in regard to this matter; the maps have been laid on the tables of Senators for six months, showing exactly what is proposed, and all done in accordance with the laws of Congress. Is it assumed that the Congress of the United States will undertake to say that they know more than the Secretary of the Treasury and know more than the officers who are collecting the customs as to how the lines of each district shall be run all over the United States? That must be left to somebody. We left it to the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to districts and he has done the work as ordered. He has done it to the satisfaction of the House, and I think to the satisfaction of the Senate, unless somebody can give a better reason than that we are giving up the power of Congress to one man and making an autocracy. We establish the collection districts at 69 if this law passes. We have them established now at 125, or 130, or whatever is the number by law. We had the internal-revenue districts established at 126. We said that there were too many, and upon investigation cut them down to 84, and the President has executed our order. The House now says something here in regard to the customs districts. We have too many, and the Secretary has furnished us the facts to show that we have.

Twenty-odd districts paying nothing are kept up at great expense with appraisers and collectors and all the machinery of collection. Thirty-odd more do not pay their expenses. It is only keeping up a set of electioneering bummers. If I must speak in the vernacular, that is the meaning of it. They are kept up for party purposes, to become party contributors, with a million dollars thrown away on them, and the officials are made to contribute because they are holding sinecures and give no other consideration for the money they get from the tax-payers, except the weight and means they give to the party in power. I did not want to say that on the floor of the Senate; but that is the truth, and the Secretary virtually admits it in his report. Now, will Democratic Senators tell them to keep their electioneering fund, and tell them to hold on to a million dollars to pay to supernumeraries upon some constitutional nicety that they are afraid somebody is going to have power to change a district?

We are seeking to make these changes for good and sufficient reasons, and those proposed reductions are the result of two years' investigation carefully made and fairly stated by the Secretary of the Treasury. That is all I care to say.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky does not state, I think, very clearly the power proposed to be given in this provision. It reads:

> And the President shall fix the boundaries of such reorganized districts and designate ports of entry therein, and shall also, from time to time, designate ports in each of such districts at which deputy collectors may be stationed to receive duties and other moneys, &c.

Sir, from the time this Government was founded to the present hour no such power was ever given to a Secretary of the Treasury. The bills introduced at every session, from time to time, asking for the establishment of ports of entry by the legislative power, go to affirm that this is a clear usurpation of the rights of the representatives of the people.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. The same useless formality was gone through with from the foundation of the Government with regard to post-routes. The Senator alluded to that before. At one sweep of the pen we dashed it all out and said: "You may establish the postal service upon any public highway to suit the good of the country." Did we surrender all power in doing that?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. We did not give it to the President.

Mr. BECK. We gave it to the President.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. We never gave it to him.

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon; the Senate gave it to him unanimously.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It may have gone through, like some other measures that have brought some reflection upon the country, such as the demonetization of silver and things of that kind, not after full discussion. As is suggested to me by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN], Congress simply established the principle that every road on which the mail was carried was a postal road. That is legislative power. But here, I say, for the first time in the history of the Government, you propose to give to the President of the United States the authority to abolish and to establish, in his discretion, ports of entry. The Constitution declares that all legislative power therein granted shall be vested in a Senate and House of Representatives, and the people in each district known as a customs district are concerned and interested in the subject as to where ports of entry shall be established.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Does not the Constitution authorize Congress to establish post-offices and post-roads?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Most assuredly.

Mr. GEORGE. Has not the President or the Postmaster-General power to establish post-offices, and does not he abolish them if he chooses?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Congress does it. I have never known the President to do it.

Mr. GEORGE. To establish post-offices?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. No.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. They are established by law, and when you are getting away from that part of the fundamental law you are abdicating your trust.

Mr. GEORGE. Do I understand the Senator to say that every post-office in the United States is established by a direct act of Congress, or is it done by the Department?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I suppose the mere machinery of the post-office is established by the Post-Office Department under the authority of Congress.

Mr. GEORGE. Has Congress ever established a post-office anywhere? Has it not always been left to the Post-Office Department?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That does not meet the question. I ask the Senator if Congress has ever before given authority to establish customs districts?

Mr. GEORGE. Does not the Constitution vest in Congress the power to establish post-offices and post-roads? If the argument is worth anything that we are abdicating a power vested in us by the Constitution and granting it to somebody else in reference to the ports of entry, does it not apply just as strongly to post-offices?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The laws of Congress I think are silent upon that subject. There have been a great many powers exercised by the Departments of this Government for which no authority can be found, and nobody knows it better than the Senator. So far as post-offices and post-roads are concerned they have been established by acts of Congress, and if there has been any departure from that principle lately it has been an unwise innovation.

Mr. GEORGE. Has there been any post-office in the United States established by act of Congress?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Let the Senator tell the Senate whether there has been or not. It is easier to ask questions than to answer them.

Mr. GEORGE. My answer is that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the post-offices are established at the discretion of the Post-Office Department and abolished at its discretion.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. By authority of law.

Mr. GEORGE. By authority of law.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. What argument does the Senator draw from that?

Mr. GEORGE. I infer from that fact that inasmuch as the Constitution gives Congress power to establish post-offices and post-roads, it can give the exercise of that power to the executive department. That has been conceded all along. The same argument, the same reasoning which will sustain that will sustain the proposition in the bill, to give the executive department the power to establish and abolish ports of entry.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Now I propose to put a question to the Senator. Does he know of an instance where the executive department abolished a post-office after it was established?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. A first-class office?

Mr. GEORGE. It is a very frequent occurrence to abolish post-offices when they have become useless. I have one case in my mind now.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator from Florida pardon me there?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. Suppose the House of Representatives should send here a bill, or a provision in a bill, declaring that hereafter there should be but sixty-nine post-offices in this country, that would be a parallel case.

Mr. GEORGE. My remarks were addressed simply to the question of power. It has been denied in this debate that Congress can delegate to the executive department the power to establish or abolish ports of entry because it is said that it is a legislative power. I quote the Constitution——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I have the floor, if the Senator will permit me. I should like to have the Senator designate the act of Congress which gives authority to the President to establish post-offices and post-roads.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know that I can refer to the special act, but I know that it is the custom everywhere.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Ah, it is the custom. As I said there has been a custom for nearly everything without authority of law. If the Senator was to hunt up the statute on that subject, I think he would hardly find it. He would find that the Constitution stands there unexecuted, and that we have uniformly exercised the legislative power in establishing post-offices and post-roads. They have made rules in the Department, they have usages, they have gone on and done a great many things, but I say that so far as the establishment of ports of entry is concerned and changing the collection districts, it has ever been regarded as a legislative power. Hundreds of bills have passed through Congress from time to time affirming the authority of Congress to establish or abolish ports of entry and ports of delivery, and this is the first attempt within my recollection to take this power away from Congress and to vest it in the discretion of the President, and that too on an appropriation bill.

I do not know what is usually contained in the post-office bills that pass Congress from time to time; a great many anomalous provisions get in of one kind or another; but I am speaking of the well-established usage of the Government with respect to collection districts, in which the people are directly interested.

I venture to say that if the proposition had been brought before the House of Representatives to abolish the number of ports of entry and delivery which I have seen marked for decimation and destruction, it would have met with opposition from the Representatives of the people of the States where those ports are located. But under the general authority here given, in which nothing specially is authorized to be done, the Secretary of the Treasury can come in and he can consolidate all the districts of my State into one, establish one port of entry for the entire territory of Florida, and the wishes of the people whose business is concerned will not be consulted.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me now to answer his question about the statute?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Yes; I want the information.

Mr. GEORGE. In answer to the question about the statute, I will read from section 3829 of the Revised Statutes:

> The Postmaster-General shall establish post-offices at all such places on post-roads established by law as he may deem expedient.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Very well; that is as far as his power goes.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator from Florida will allow me, I have here the act passed by Congress and approved by the President during the present session with reference to post-roads, in which it is enacted:

> That all public roads and highways, while kept up and maintained as such, are hereby declared to be post-routes.

Heretofore there has been no power on the part of the Post-Office Department to establish a post-office or to put service upon any road until Congress has made it a post-road. Year by year Congress has passed a bill called the post-route bill establishing post-routes. Now, Congress has made all roads in use post-roads. There never had been given to the executive department any power to establish a post-road anywhere.

Mr. GEORGE. I did not assert that.

Mr. HALE. Nor a post-office, excepting upon such a road as had been established by Congress. That has been the law always and is so today.

Mr. GEORGE. Notwithstanding that, the Constitution draws a distinction between post-offices and post-roads. It gives the power to Congress to establish post-offices and post-roads. Although Congress may have uniformly exercised the power to establish post-roads, it also uniformly exercised the power to grant to the Postmaster-General the power of establishing post-offices.

Mr. ALLISON. But I wish the Senator from Mississippi to answer the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], who suggests that the situation here is a limitation to the number, sixty-nine. Would the Senator from Mississippi, as a representative from his State, be willing to confide this authority to the executive power, limiting the number so that there could be only a certain number, and that a limited number, throughout the Union? There is no parallel in the suggestion that he makes now with reference to post-offices and post-roads.

Mr. GEORGE. May I answer now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Oh, yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. The answer to the position taken by the Senator from Kansas and repeated by the Senator from Iowa is a very plain one. We are not discussing, at least I am not, or have not been during this debate, the question of the expediency of the exercise of the power; I am discussing alone the question whether the power exists. It has been denied in debate here. It has been said that this is a reasonable legislative power which Congress can not delegate to the executive department. I have endeavored to show not that it is proper to exercise the power—I have said nothing about that—but that the power of delegation does exist; and I have shown that under the express grant made by the Constitution to Congress to establish post-offices—Congress shall have power "to establish post-offices," is the language of the Constitution—Congress has uniformly granted to the Postmaster-General or the executive department the power to establish and abolish post-offices.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Not to abolish post-offices. The Senator did not read the statute.

Mr. GEORGE. I have not read it, but I have already got the volume and will turn to it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I asked him awhile ago if the statute went so far as to give authority to abolish post-offices. It gave the Postmaster-General authority to establish post-offices for the convenience of the people on such post-routes as might be established by law. That is as far as it has gone. There is a great difference between these two powers. The power to regulate commerce is the power under which every provision of law is made looking to the collection of the revenue and the establishment of customs districts, and it is a very different power from that to which reference has been made relating to post-offices. Take, for instance, the inhibition in the Constitution contained——

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Hold on for a moment. I do not wish to be interrupted just now.

Mr. GEORGE. I merely wanted to furnish the Senator the other information he called for about abolishing post-offices.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I say there is no analogy between the two powers; that no possible danger can be apprehended from the exercise of the power to which the Senator alluded in regard to post-offices and post-roads, while to give the power claimed in the bill in reference to customs districts to the head of the Treasury Department might result in the sheerest usurpation and danger to the private rights of individuals. The Constitution was carefully drawn on the subject when it came to the regulations of commerce; and what is this but a regulation of commerce? One of the most important regulations of commerce, let me tell the Senator from Mississippi, is that which designates the particular points in the country where vessels may enter and discharge cargo and from which they can obtain clearances. It is this privilege that gives to commerce its vitality and its life. If a President of the United States should be invested with the absolute power of designating the particular ports or places where duties could be collected and clearances made, he would have it in his power to destroy the vital interests of commercial communities.

It may be said that you are not to argue from the existence of a power to the abuse of it; but when it comes to this question I am not willing to give this authority to any one man; I am not willing to leave it to him to say that the business of Pensacola shall be abolished, and that all clearances in that section of country shall be made in the port of Mobile. I am not willing for him to have authority to say that all clearances and entries shall be made at one point in Florida. It never was intended that this authority should be given to one man, especially when you come to read the inhibition contained in clause 6 of section 9 of article 1 of the Constitution, which says:

> No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce on revenue to the ports of one State over those of another.

Those regulations are to be uniform. This is not a restriction upon the executive power; it is a restriction upon the legislative power. It never was intended that the Executive should have anything to do with designating the boundaries of collection districts or with designating the ports where revenues should be collected or clearances made. The whole practice of the Government from its foundation to the present hour vindicates the truth of what I say.

In reply to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] I will say that the establishment of these ports never was made to rest upon the mere question of income from the offices. The convenience of the people concerned in commerce was regarded. Politics did not enter into it, nor party interests; nothing of that kind. It was left with the representatives of the States and of the people, as is shown by the petitions on file in Congress from year to year for the establishment of ports of entry and for obtaining additional facilities for the people to carry on commerce with the world at large. That has always been done through Congress, and Congress alone.

What innovations have taken place in regard to the postal system I am not prepared to say, but I think we have gone far enough in the line of usurpation. I am willing to stand by the wholesome records of the past on this subject. If they want any diminution in the number of districts where revenue is collected or a change made, let them come before Congress and let them designate the changes to be made. Let us understand what ports of entry are going to be abolished, so that those of us who are interested in the subject may be able to do our duty toward our constituents, but do not let us leave it in the discretion of an officer sitting here in Washington, a clerk of the President, to execute the laws, to say where revenues shall be collected, where entries shall be made, where clearances shall be effected in derogation of the usage and the customs of the past.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I was asked by the Senator from Florida to produce the statute which authorized the Postmaster-General or the executive department of the Government to establish post-offices. I produced that statute. Then the Senator from Florida challenged me to produce a statute which authorized the Post-Office Department to abolish post-offices. I have found that statute also, and for his satisfaction I will read it. Section 3864 of the Revised Statutes reads as follows:

> The Postmaster-General may discontinue any post-office where the safety and security of the postal service and revenues are endangered from any cause whatever, or where the efficiency of the service requires such discontinuance, and he shall promptly certify such discontinuance to the Sixth Auditor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the Committee on Appropriations striking out from the bill the matter between line 890 and line 940.

Mr. BECK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. If I were not paired, I should vote "nay."

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). My colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN]. I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. If the Senator from Illinois were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER], who would vote "yea" on this amendment, is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GROOME].

Mr. HARRIS. My colleague [Mr. JACKSON], who was called home yesterday, is paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON].

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—41.

Allison,	Frye,	Logan,	Ransom,
Bowen,	Garland,	McMillan,	Riddleberger,
Brown,	Hale,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Call,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Sewell,

So the amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had appointed Mr. WILLIAM H. HATCH, of Missouri, one of the managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 251) providing for printing the annual Report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1884, in place of Mr. W. F. ROGERS, of New York, excused.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 25) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 1017) relative to the Inspector-General's department of the Army;

A bill (H. R. 4696) to authorize the location of a branch home for disabled volunteer soldiers and sailors in either the State of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, or Nebraska;

A bill (H. R. 5890) to provide for the settlement of accounts of officers of the Army who served during the war of the rebellion;

A bill (H. R. 5670) to authorize a retired-list for privates and noncommissioned officers of the United States Army who have served for a period of thirty years or upward;

A bill (H. R. 5713) to provide for the settlement of the claims of officers and enlisted men of the Army for loss of private property destroyed in the military service of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. 5709) to amend article 72 of the Rules and Articles of War.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 4678) to remove certain disabilities of Henry Newman;

A bill (H. R. 2400) for the relief of Judith Lauter;

A bill (H. R. 4707) granting a pension to Louisa V. de Kilpatrick, widow of Maj. Gen. Judson Kilpatrick;

A bill (H. R. 4981) granting a pension to Isabella I. Ramsdell;

A bill (H. R. 5458) to remove the disabilities of Robert D. Thorburn, of Virginia;

A bill (H. R. 4411) to provide for the administration of oaths to witnesses in matters pending in either House of Congress;

A bill (H. R. 1340) to establish a bureau of labor;

A bill (H. R. 1076) granting a pension to Miles B. Farlin;

A bill (H. R. 6021) to authorize the National Bank of Middletown, Pa., to change its name and location; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 137) for printing the annual reports of the Bureau of Ethnology.

COUNT OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. 25) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon, which passed the Senate, was sent to the House of Representatives, and is returned with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. The amendment of the House of Representatives will be printed, and the bill with the amendment will be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

JUDGE-ADVOCATE-GENERAL'S BUREAU.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 838) to consolidate the Bureau of Military Justice and the corps of judge-advocates of the Army, and for other purposes.

Mr. MAXEY. I move that the Senate non-concur in the amendment proposed by the House, and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the amendment had better be read. Perhaps it would be concurred in.

Mr. MAXEY. It proposes a complete change of the whole bill. It is a new measure entirely to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I think it ought to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs before being sent to a committee of conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the House of Representatives will be read and then it will be open to debate.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of the House of Representatives is to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That in view of the absence of all promotion in the corps of judge-advocates of the Army, whenever any officer of said corps shall have served fifteen years' continuous service as major he shall be promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and when he shall have served thirty years he shall be promoted to the rank of colonel; but such promotion shall not authorize an appointment to fill any vacancy when such appointment would increase the whole number of officers in the corps beyond the number fixed by law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] moves that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. MAXEY. I can explain to the Senator from Ohio in one minute why I make that motion. The precise bill which is now reported as an amendment to the Senate bill was before the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate and was rejected by that committee. The committee reported a bill which was unanimously adopted by the Senate. So I know what the sentiment of the Committee on Military Affairs is. However, if the Senator wishes to have the bill and the amendment of the House referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, I have no objection to the reference.

Mr. SHERMAN. Under the circumstances, if the Committee on Military Affairs have considered it, I have no objection to a committee of conference.

Mr. MAXEY. The Committee on Military Affairs considered precisely the same bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Of course the proper order of business is to refer a substitute of this kind to the committee from which the bill came.

Mr. MAXEY. The amendment is exactly the wording of a substitute offered in the Senate by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] which was laid before the Committee on Military Affairs. The bill which we adopted is one which meets the concurrence of the War Department, and unanimously of the Committee on Military Affairs. It was in my charge and was reported by me by direction of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. LOGAN, Mr. SEWELL, and Mr. MAXEY were appointed.

ABANDONED MILITARY RESERVATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1581) to provide for the disposal of abandoned and useless military reservations.

Mr. COCKRELL. There are three amendments added to the bill by the House. I ask that the bill lie on the table until we can have time so consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered if there be no objection. The Chair lays before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 7004) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of public lands and the laws allowing entries for timber-culture was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 1017) relative to the Inspector-General's Department of the Army;

A bill (H. R. 4696) to authorize the location of a branch home for disabled soldiers and sailors in either the State of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, or Nebraska;

A bill (H. R. 5890) to provide for the settlement of accounts of officers of the Army who served during the war of the rebellion;

A bill (H. R. 5670) to authorize a retired-list for privates and non-commissioned officers of the United States Army who have served for a period of thirty years or upward;

A bill (H. R. 5713) to provide for the settlement of the claims of officers and enlisted men of the Army for loss of private property destroyed in the military service of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. 5709) to amend article 72 of the Rules and Articles of War.

TRANSPORTATION OF DUTIABLE GOODS.

The bill (H. R. 6215) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880, was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORRILL. That bill is precisely the bill reported by the Committee on Finance unanimously only a few days since. It merely changes the existing law in relation to the transportation of dutiable goods by railway so that they can be transported not only by railway, but partly by water routes. For instance, if goods were taken from New York to the lakes they could still be transported in bond, or from the Gulf across to California. The only change in the existing law is to insert the words "or where the route is bonded for both land and water carriage." As it is thought to be important by the railroads, I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill from the House, which is word for word the Senate bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall not object to it if it does not lead to debate.

Mr. MORRILL. If it leads to any discussion I shall not ask for its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the bill be now considered.

Mr. ALLISON. I think I shall have to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. MORRILL. Let the bill lie on the table, and when the appropriation bill is through I shall call it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie on the table, if there be no objection.

PETITION.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the petition of Mary F. Potts, of Philadelphia, Pa., praying an extension for her letters patent for a certain improvement on flat-irons; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 23d instant, a report respecting the workings of the underground telegraphic cables laid between the Capitol and Executive Departments; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORRILL introduced a bill (S. 2342) declaratory of the meaning of the act entitled "An act for the relief of Maria Syphax;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Amendments were submitted by Mr. MILLER of New York, Mr. BAYARD, Mr. GROOME, Mr. ALDRICH, Mr. MILLER of California, Mr. LAPHAM, Mr. SAWYER, Mr. GARLAND, Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. JONAS, and Mr. SEWELL, intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which, with the accompanying papers, were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. FRYE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MAHONE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 445) to empower the Secretary of War to permit the establishment, under certain conditions, of a horse-railway upon and over the island of Rock Island and the bridges erected by the United States connecting the cities of Davenport and Rock Island therewith; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 1727) to grant letter-carriers at free-delivery offices fifteen days' leave in each year;

A bill (H. R. 2346) for the relief of Sarah A. Redmond;

A bill (H. R. 4652) for the relief of Saint Luke's Protestant Episcopal church, in the District of Columbia;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 138) for printing the annual reports of the United States Geological Survey; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 264) to amend a resolution approved August 7, 1882, providing for the publication of report of Public Land Commissioner.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 445) to empower the Secretary of War to establish, under certain conditions, a horse-railway upon and over the island of Rock Island, and the bridges erected by the United States connecting the cities of Davenport and Rock Island therewith, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7069) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 940, to insert:

And hereafter it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, at the beginning of each regular session of Congress, to submit a report specifying in detail the number and class of officers and employés of every grade and nature in the customs service, with the rate of compensation received by each, together with a statement of all fees and emoluments of every kind and nature at each port of entry and delivery in the United States, and how distributed among the officers and employés of each port, respectively; and also an estimate of the number of officers and employés at each port and the rate of compensation to each that may, in his judgment, be required to properly conduct the business of collecting the revenue at each port, together with an estimate of the amounts required for contingent expenses at each of said ports, and for such additional expenses of the service as can not be otherwise specifically provided for.

Mr. BECK. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that the amendment, in my judgment, is all right as far as it goes, but I should like to know what the object is in having this report made to us unless we propose to do something with it? It ought to be amended in some way so as to indicate that we are about to abolish the permanent appropriations made for all these things and make appropriations for them in accordance with the recommendations of the Department. If we are not going to do that, it is hardly worth while for the Secretary of the Treasury to tell us year by year what he does unless we propose to do something ourselves.

Mr. HALE. When we get the report we can act upon it.

Mr. BECK. We have the report every year. We have had one for the current year.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator object to the amendment?

Mr. BECK. I have no objection to it so far as it goes, but it is wholly inconclusive unless we do something. The former Secretary of the Treasury, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], whom I see now before me, urged us to take this thing in our charge and make these appropriations. We did agree to it as far as the Senate was concerned by passing two bills. This information is very valuable if we are going to carry it out, but it ought to be amended in order that Congress may make the appropriations in accordance with it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe that this provision is entirely unnecessary. The law itself now provides for annual reports of the very facts stated here, and it is only making an unnecessary expense. Every second year by law the salary of every officer, the amount paid to every employé is published in what is called the Blue Book. The very information called for here is published in the best form possible for public use, and every year in the reports made by the Secretary of the Treasury this information is contained.

It seems to me that the amendment is totally unnecessary and would tend to complicate matters. I suppose this was intended to be an appendix to the preceding provision which has been stricken from the bill, and I think by common consent it ought to be disagreed to at present. If there is any information called for in this amendment which is not contained in the regular reports, I do not know it. It seems to me that it is only a part of the preceding provision, and therefore it had better be stricken out.

Mr. BECK. There is nothing in the amendment, unless it means that we are hereafter going to take charge of and appropriate for the compensation of all these officers in accordance with the report; because, as was said by the Senator from Ohio, the reports of the Treasurer and other officers give us at least once in two years what they purport to spend, but we have no control whatever over them. If we add to this that Congress shall hereafter act in accordance with it or take it under its charge it would be a very valuable amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. As both the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Kentucky object to the amendment I shall not insist upon it.

Mr. BECK. I do not object to it, except that it looks to me like an inconclusive effort to assume that we are going to do something when we do not propose to do anything. I am perfectly willing to let it go in.

Mr. INGALLS. Is not the amendment open to a point of order on the ground of being general legislation? If it is I interpose that objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). In the opinion of the Chair the amendment would be subject to that point. The point of order is sustained.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 959, to increase the appropriation "for salaries and expenses of agents and surveyors, for fees and expenses of gaugers, for salaries of storekeepers, and for miscellaneous expenses," from $2,164,000 to $2,300,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out, from line 960 to line 978, the following words:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall exempt all distilleries which mash ten bushels of grain or less per day from the operation of the provisions of title 35 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to payment of the tax; and said distilleries shall be run and operated without storekeepers; and said Secretary may exempt any distillery or all distilleries which mash twenty-five bushels of grain per day from the operation of the provision of said title relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to the payment of the tax; and any distillery so exempted shall be run as fruit distilleries are now operated: Provided, That special warehouses may be established by the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he may cause to be deposited the product of any number of said distilleries, to be designated by him by his order, and in which any of said distillers may deposit his product, and when so deposited shall be subject to all the laws and regulations as to bonds, tax, removal, and otherwise as is now provided by law for other warehouses.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

And section 3261 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"No collector shall approve the bond of any distiller until all the requirements of the law, and all regulations made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in relation to distilleries in pursuance thereof, have been complied with; nor shall the collector hereafter approve any bond of a grain distiller the survey of whose distillery shall be for a less capacity then ten bushels of grain per day; nor shall the survey of any grain distillery be made for a less capacity than ten bushels of grain per day; nor shall the per diem capacity of any grain distillery be reduced below ten bushels. Every collector who violates this provision shall forfeit and pay $2,000 and be dismissed from office; and every distiller of grain who, after the 1st day of November, 1884, operates his distillery on a less capacity than ten bushels of grain per day shall be liable to the fines, forfeitures, and imprisonment specified in section 3260 of the Revised Statutes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. INGALLS. I reserve the point of order on the amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is entitled to the floor.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. Psesident, I hope the Senate will not concur in that proposition to strike out and insert. In the operations of the small distilleries in this country I think there is more shameless corruption and fraud practiced upon the Government than in any other department of this Government, great as that may be. In the States of Kentucky, West Virginia, Virginia, Tennessee, North and South Carolina, and Georgia there are found a great many small distilleries with a capacity of from three and three and a half bushels to ten bushels of grain per day. In the State of North Carolina there are reported to be 408 grain distilleries, 371 of which are in constant operation, and 1,246 fruit distilleries, making 1,654. Only five have a capacity of mashing more than 10 bushels per day. To each one of these grain distilleries there is assigned a storekeeper and gauger. To every six or eight of the fruit distilleries is assigned a gauger during that period of the year when they are in operation, and in every county there are more or less of what are called warehouses, or storehouses, which also have in attendance upon them what is called a general storekeeper, the pay of whom is from four to five dollars per day.

The product of taxation on this whole number of 1,654 small distilleries in North Carolina is $451,194. The total amount of taxation collected by the Internal Revenue Department in the State of North Carolina amounts to $2,377,116, of which $1,925,922 is derived from tobacco, leaving $451,194 as the product of these small distilleries of grain and fruit.

I will give the Senate in a moment the cost of running these small distilleries and of collecting the revenue from them. For the past year, ending June 30, 1883, the amount collected in the sixth collection district alone, the one in which the greatest number of the small distilleries is to be found, was $456,864.16. The cost of collecting that last year was $190,284.26, or about 40 per cent. Of this $456,864.16, I have not the exact means of determining what portion is attributable to tobacco and what to spirits, for the tobacco product and the spirits product are not separated in the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the districts as they are for the State; but from my personal knowledge of the manufactories of tobacco which are situated in that district I am quite sure that the amount of money collected from the spirits alone would not pay the cost of its collection.

In the year 1881, the amount collected in that district was $499,455.08, and the cost of collecting it was $268,324, or about 57 per cent., and when the cost of suits in court and of prosecutions and of all the legal proceedings attendant upon the execution of the law is taken into consideration the cost in that district of collecting the tax on both whisky and tobacco was about 90 per cent., as placed by the estimate of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and taking out the tobacco proceeds the cost of collecting the spirit tax in that district was far more than the tax itself.

To show you that this system is used not for the purpose of revenue but for the purpose of maintaining an army of office-holders who answer a very convenient and satisfactory purpose about election times, I will read the cost of collecting the internal revenue since 1878 in that district and show what years there was a general election held and what years there was not a general election held, and ask Senators to note the difference.

For the year ending June 30, 1878, the amount collected in the sixth collection district of North Carolina was $252,288.24. The cost of collecting it was $57,541.47, or about 25 per cent. That year there was no election. In 1879 the amount collected was $338,659.93, being an increase of about 30 per cent. on the amount collected, and the cost of collecting was $136,987.05, being an increase of nearly 300 per cent. in the cost of collecting. That was the election year. For the year ending June 30, 1880, the amount collected was $455,457.88, and the cost of collecting was $182,192.70. There was no election that year. For the year ending June 30, 1881, the amount collected was $499,455.08, and the cost of collecting was $268,324, or about 57 per cent., as I have said before. There was an election that year. For the year ending June 30, 1882, the amount collected was $508,174.32, the cost of collecting which was $159,970.36. There was no election that year.

Mr. ALLISON. No election in 1882?

Mr. VANCE. No election for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882. So in that case there was an increase of only $9,000 in the amount collected, and there was a decrease of $107,000 in the cost of collection as compared with the preceding election year. The amount collected for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, was $456,864.16, and the cost of collecting was $190,284.26, as I before said. This covered the election year of 1882, embracing the period of the fall of 1882, when the elections were held.

If anything more were needed to show that this whole machinery was used down there in the State of North Carolina for purely political purposes and as a means of relieving the campaign committees of the expense of hiring men out of their own pockets for the purpose of canvassing, let me further read about the appointment of officers in that same district. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, which period covered no election, the total number of officers reported was three hundred and thirty-nine, of whom thirty-seven were special deputies. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, which period covered the State and national elections, the number of officers was four hundred and twenty-seven, of which number fifty-four were special deputies. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, a period which covered no political election, the number of officers shrank down to three hundred and ten, and the number of special deputies shrank down to nine, although the records show that there had been a steady increase in the number of small distilleries and there ought to have been, if honestly administered, an increase in the officers in proportion.

I have already read the expenses of collecting. In 1878 there were paid to the character of officers called gaugers only $3,937.31; for the year ending June 30, 1879, $2,228.20; for the year ending June 30, 1880, $3,519.09; for the year ending June 30, 1881, $8,306.48, and for the year ending June 30, 1882, $10,897.50. The amount paid to storekeepers in the same period for the year ending June 30, 1878, was $28,922; for the year ending June 30, 1879, $98,757; for the year ending June 30, 1880, $161,412; for the year ending June 30, 1881, $201,395. That covered the year of the Presidential election in 1880. For the year ending June 30, 1882, the amount paid to storekeepers was $115,567. So it goes up or it goes down just as the exigencies of the party may require and the revenue takes care of itself, the object of the Department being to take care of the elections.

Mr. President, I speak advisedly about this, not only from personal observation but from the report of the special committee of the Senate which in 1882 investigated this whole subject, and the facts were elicited which I have read to the Senate, and which are not denied and can not be denied. It was also ascertained and proven before that committee that the storekeepers who were receiving $3 a day at the small distilleries in order to induce a distiller to set up and run his distillery would agree to divide his pay with him. It only takes about $150 to start one of these small distilleries. A system prevailed of the collector issuing commissions to whatever young men he thought he could influence politically by doing so. He would tell such: "I have not any work for you at present, but I am expecting some distillery to start. Here is your commission; you will be ready and you will receive your $3 a day as soon as some distillery starts." The young man would take his commission and he would stand around waiting for a considerable time until he would get tired, and then he would go to some neighbor and propose to him, "If you will start a distillery now I will give you half my pay, because I would rather be getting a dollar and a half per day than to be getting nothing."

Under this arrangement a distiller could be induced to start one of these small, one-horse distilleries, mashing, as they call it, four bushels of corn a day, which would make about eight gallons a day if they had good luck and the weather was propitious. That eight gallons yielded a tax of 90 cents a gallon, making $7.20. The grain would cost from $3 to $4 to run the still one day, and all the expenses of the distillery put together would not amount to more than a dollar per day besides, so that the storekeeper paid almost one-half of the total expenses of running the distillery; and we have the strange spectacle, the dignified spectacle presented to the world of the Government of the United States being in partnership with a four-bushel distiller and running it on shares. The compensation that the Government received in reward for this sacrifice of its dignity was that both the distiller and the storekeeper became sworn bummers of the Republican party and answerable to all the calls made upon them both in time and money.

Not only was this done, but under the operation of the provision of the Secretary of the Treasury whenever a man had a twelve-bushel distillery operating according to law he would divide it and make three distilleries of four bushels each, and in that way he would get half the salary of $3 per day from three storekeepers instead of one.

Now, sir, that is not a fancy sketch. I never laid much claim to imagination, and I could not have invented anything so ridiculous, so absurd as that. Those facts were sworn to before the committee which was appointed specially to investigate these things. With a guilty copartnership like that, of the sworn officers of the law with the violators of the law, of course there was no end possible to be conceived of the iniquities that would be perpetrated under such a system. Among other things proven before that committee was the acceptance of the idea that if a distiller could make anything more out of his run than the minimum of his registered capacity he was entitled to have that excess tax free. It was generally estimated in that country that two gallons ought to be made from each bushel of grain, and that was the minimum of the law.

If a distiller by successful manipulation, and by all circumstances being favorable, could manage to make three gallons to the bushel the storekeeper did not pretend to tax him for over two gallons. That was his. He took it of course. That was so much clear gain. Whenever the weather and the other circumstances did not tend to the production of a good run, a large turn out, the storekeeper very accommodatingly turned his back and allowed the distiller to mash in as much grain as he could possibly cram into his distillery in order to make that three gallons, or to increase the amount over that which was supposed to be required by law. It was proven before this committee in divers instances that the storekeepers never pretended to weigh or measure their material; but when the material was placed in a box which by law should have been kept locked, and he should have had the key, he left the box open and would go away to the country, or off on a visit somewhere, and the distiller had nothing to do but to help himself. It was testified before us that more than one-half of all the spirits produced at these small distilleries escaped taxation in that way. One distiller, whom I remember in particular, swore that he ran and operated a distillery whose capacity was forty-eight gallons a week; that he made one hundred and two gallons per week in that same distillery, fifty-two of which never paid any tax. The storekeeper did not deny but that it was to be his, and he could make that much over and above the minimum required.

It would be endless to detail the frauds committed in these small distilleries down there in the State of North Carolina, and I presume they are a sample of all of them in the mountain country of the Southern States where they are in operation.

But the most beautiful part of the system, and I suppose the one in which the Senators on the other side will take the liveliest interest, was the political part of it. A tax was levied—I speak advisedly—of 12 per cent. That was the regular tax, to say nothing of special calls that the exigencies of the party required to be made—one-twelfth, or one month's salary; so that if an officer, a deputy collector, or a storekeeper was receiving $100 per month, he gave one month's salary, or $100, every campaign for the purpose of promoting the interests of his party. In one campaign it was estimated that not less than $30,000 was raised for corruption purposes, and when it was undertaken to inquire into where that money had gone after it was raised, the majority of the committee refused to let that veil be withdrawn. That was sacred ground which no profane eyes had any right to behold.

These contributions were levied voluntarily; of course there was no compulsion about it, though several men swore that if they had not paid the money they had no doubt in the world that they would have gone out, and they paid it for fear that they would go out. A number refused to pay and did go out of office, or if their commissions were not taken from them they failed ever afterward to get any work. In addition to that, bargains were sometimes made by the collector beforehand: "I will appoint you to a commission now with the understanding that you are to give one month's service, or $50 or $100, as the case may be, to forward the cause of the party which promotes you."

A system so corrupt it seems to me ought not to be upheld and maintained by any party or any portion of the American people who profess to desire purity in government or in politics. Those men have absolute control of the politics of North Carolina; they hold all the positions; they represent all the public opinion of the Republican party in that country; they send delegates to all the national conventions, and they talk loudest about the freedom of the ballot and the oppression of the Democratic party in the South, and the desire to have pure and free elections, and they assist in nominating all the candidates of the party. Such is the legitimate outgrowth of this system.

But that is not the worst, Mr. President. I am happy to say that such a state of things does not now prevail, but for many, many long, weary years after the war had closed this system had been brought to bear upon the people of North Carolina and the Southern States generally where these small distilleries were. Owing to the oppression, the exaction, the insolence, and the tyranny of the men who exercised the authority of the Government in the collection of this internal revenue numbers of outrages of all kinds have occurred. There was at one time a most unhappy state of affairs down there, all growing out of the fact that the execution of these laws, odious at all times and to all people, was intrusted to men under circumstances which gave rise to so much corruption and misrule. It calls for a wiping out. It is no economy on the part of the Government to maintain the system at such a vast expense, at the cost of worrying and harassing its people, and exciting so much dissatisfaction against the Government of the United States as this whole system has done.

These men are not subjected to the examinations and requirements of the civil-service act. It will be recollected that when that bill was pending in the Senate I proposed by an amendment to it to subject the officers who were to be appointed under the internal-revenue laws to the same scrutiny and the same tests of character and of official fitness as other subordinates of the Government were; and although that amendment was acceptable to the distinguished Senator who was the author of the bill, it was promptly voted down by gentlemen on the other side. So that we have now in the United States a vast brigade, an army of officials who are not subject to any test of the civil service law, but are appointed purely at the pleasure of the collectors, and who look to them for their preferment and for the approbation of their conduct.

I will read to the Senate, taken from the official record, the number of officers that are not confirmed by the Senate and who are not in any way subjected to the official tests of capacity that other officers are in the Departments. In 1882 the Commissioner of Internal Revenue reports that there were 976 deputy collectors. I make no mention of collectors, as they are subject to the confirmation of the Senate. There were 867 gaugers; there were 1,000 storekeepers and gaugers; there were 552 storekeepers; there were 199 clerks, messengers, &c., and 13 inspectors of tobacco, making 3,624 for the year 1882.

In 1883 there were 981 deputy collectors; there were 226 clerks and messengers; there were 852 gaugers; there were 1,130 storekeepers and gaugers; there were 725 storekeepers; there were 35 tobacco inspectors, and 23 surveyors of distilleries, making 3,972 officers of this Government whose fitness can not be inquired into by any person under the authority of the civil-service law of the United States and can not be known to the Senate; and there is an increase of more than three hundred in one year, notwithstanding the fact that a portion of the districts had been abolished and that consolidation had been gradually going on.

Now, sir, the text of the bill as it comes to us from the House proposes to abolish this state of things, and without doing away or dispensing with any of the taxes due from those small distilleries, it proposes to abolish the machinery by which this vast array of men are kept in the pay of the Government to such a disadvantage to its efficiency and purity:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall exempt all distilleries which mash ten bushels of grain or less per day from the operation of the provisions of title 35 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to payment of the tax; and said distilleries shall be run and operated without storekeepers; and said Secretary may exempt any distillery or all distilleries which mash twenty-five bushels of grain per day from the operation of the provision of said title relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to the payment of the tax; and any distillery so exempted shall be run as fruit distilleries are now operated: Provided, That special warehouses may be established by the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he may cause to be deposited the product of any number of said distilleries, to be designated by him by his order, &c.

Why should not that be the law? The tax is not released; and it will not do to say that if grain distilleries are permitted to operate on the same small scale as fruit distilleries are frauds will be perpetrated. The whole number of these small distilleries, if run from the 1st of January to the 31st of December without cessation, could not, if they paid no tax whatever, defraud the Government out of more than the cost of maintaining this army of men in the State of North Carolina. To make them a present of their taxation would not equal the amount of fraud that is perpetrated now in the name of the law. There is no reason, I may say, to suppose that there would be any more frauds perpetrated by a man who runs a small grain distillery than by a man who runs a small fruit distillery. They would be under precisely the same supervision and they would pay precisely the same tax, and we should have the satisfaction of knowing that if the gross proceeds did fall somewhat short of the present amount the net proceeds would far exceed it, and the authorizing of the Secretary of the Treasury to designate particular warehouses in which all the productions of a certain number of distilleries should be deposited, to be under the supervision of only one storekeeper instead of as now, having each little warehouse with its own storekeeper—I can not see how that can possibly be objected to by any one with a view to economy.

The motion to strike out is followed by the proposition of the committee to insert what has been read by the Secretary, and which in effect absolutely prohibits the running of any distillery of less than ten gallons. Now, Mr. President, that is one way to cure the evils of which I have spoken, it is true, but it seems to me it is not the right way. I do not know that we have a right, because a man is poor and unable to operate a large distillery, to say that he shall not operate any at all. It seems to me that that would be following up the idea of encouraging the large establishments of the country to the exclusion and the crowding out of the small. We should be following out the idea that capital is entitled to receive the chief protection of the law while the poor are not so entitled. I do not see any reason why a man who because he is not able to run a distillery of the capacity of ten bushels per day should not be permitted to run a distillery of four if he has the means to do so and sees proper to do so; and if he does, I see no reason why he shonld not be permitted to run it under the same terms as his neighbor who runs a fruit distillery.

I feel a great interest in this subject, Mr. President. I liv e in the midst of these evils of which I have complained, and I can assure Senators that if they could see the workings of this internal-revenue system as applicable to the small distilleries scattered throughout a poor mountain country they would agree with me that it is a scandal upon the people of the United States to maintain it any longer, that it is worthless in point of revenue, it is provocative of ill-feeling and of crime and of all manner of disturbance between the officers of the Government and the people, which ought to be avoided, and that they would unite with me in maintaining the bill as it came from the House of Representatives and putting an end to it as far as that does.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the two propositions by the Senate Committee on Appropriations and by the House of Representatives, opposing each other, are perhaps as striking an illustration of the evils of this system of legislation as has been exhibited here for several years. Here is an ordinary appropriation for gaugers and storekeepers and for the expenses of collecting the internal revenue. To that the House of Representatives attach a provision which will absolutely destroy all hope or possibility of collecting any tax from whisky distilled from grain in all the mountain States of this country. I will venture to say (and I think the argument of the Senator from North Carolina illustrates it probably as well as any argument I could make) that if this House proposition should be adopted it would be idle to attempt to collect any tax on whisky from grain in all the region from the northern part of Pennsylvania clear through the Alleghany range and in all those places where the small distilleries are now planted. The Senator from North Carolina himself described in his own way the evils of the present system, how difficult it is to collect the tax, even with the aid of storekeepers and with all the enginery provided by law. He says the storekeepers divide their pay with the distillers; they combine together to cheat the Government and convert this machinery of the law into an electioneering process. I do not know anything about that. I have always had a very good idea of the people of North Carolina; but the Senator gives them rather a bad caste in his argument. They combine to cheat the Government of the United States, according to his statement, and divide the fees.

But assuming that the people of North Carolina are in that respect like all other people who are looking after their own interest, let me suppose the case that there should be no storekeeper, no gauger, no representative of the Government of the United States to watch over these distilleries when the distillers, sustained as they are by public opinion in their neighborhood, would have no desire to pay the tax or account for it, how much is it imagined the Government of the United States would receive from such a tax?

There may not be very many distilleries of that kind in North Carolina now, though, if I remember aright, there are a thousand of them; but, let this House provision become the law, and there would be 5,000. If there was no storekeeper in any of the small distilleries, they would, in that whole mountain chain, multiply as rapidly as the lice of Egypt. The result would be that not only would there be no tax collected from this whisky, but it would have its influence also in the great whisky-producing regions of Kentucky and Ohio and Illinois, and practically destroy this important source of revenue.

I have no doubt that evils exist now, and did exist under the old system; but at one time the Treasury Department made a kind of league or alliance with the distillers of New Jersey and North Carolina, by which they agreed to behave themselves and pay the tax. Certain restrictions were removed, under the provisions of law, by the authority of the Treasury Department, and since that time so far as I know the tax has been fairly collected in that region. It is true the cost has been very large in proportion to the income, but that is necessary, because these small distilleries sometimes require as much expense to watch them as large distilleries do. Therefore the expense in these small distilleries is larger in proportion than in the large distilleries; but it is necessary to maintain the watchfulness of the officers over the small distilleries to prevent fraud having its influence on the larger distilleries.

This proposition I therefore would say was a plan to enable the distilleries in North Carolina and that whole region of country to escape the whisky tax, while the Senate committee's proposition is not much better. The Senate committee's proposition is to absolutely prohibit by law all the people of that region of country from converting their surplus grain into a marketable article in the neighborhood and also an article of merchandise to be sent abroad. It undertakes by the power of the law to prohibit the operation of the small distillery that only consumes ten bushels of grain a day making about thirty gallons, or twenty-five bushels a day making about seventy-five gallons of whisky a day. If you accumulated these distilleries you would soon make enough for all the markets of the country and the result would be that we could not collect the tax at all. If we can not collect it with the aid of gaugers and storekeepers and with the watchful machinery of the law how can we do it without any of these agencies?

But on the other hand the Senate committee's proposition is to restrain these people from doing what they have done probably for one hundred and fifty years, manufacturing their own whisky. I do not believe it can be done. I believe this prohibition on the part of the Senate would fall idle, as dead, as useless, and foolish a restriction and prohibition on the power of the people to do what they want to do as any proposition could be. If they are not authorized to do it by law they will do it without law, and then you have to have your gaugers and constables and sheriffs and marshals and your machinery with officers there to prevent them from violating the law. They would start these little distilleries everywhere, which, as the Senator tells us, cost only $150. Then you would have to have an army of office-holders of a different kind, your marshals, &c., to watch and carry out your prohibition.

Both propositions are equally offensive to good policy and good morals, and neither ought to find its way into the statute-book, and especially into an appropriation bill. I reserve the right to object to the proposition of the Senate committee.

To show that what I have stated is true I will read two brief clauses of what the House propose:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall exempt all distilleries which mash ten bushels of grain or less per day from the operation of the provisions of title 35 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to payment of the tax.

This strikes down every guard, every protection that is now devised by law to prevent frauds in the manufacture of whisky from grain, and then it goes further—a still more dangerous provision—and authorizes the Secretary at his discretion, either in special cases or by general rule, to authorize distillers making seventy-five gallons a day, or consuming twenty-five bushels of grain—the average is about three gallons to the bushel—to manufacture even seventy-five gallons a day without watchful guards, without any of the machinery of the law. It is idle to discuss that further.

While this opens the door for fraud, the other proposition is an arbitrary assertion of power that I do not think ought to be exercised by the Congress of the United States. Here it is; this is the Senate committee's proposition:

Nor shall the survey of any grain distillery be made for a less capacity than ten bushels of grain per day.

That is, all the multitude of small distillers over the United States, who make but a small quantity of whisky for home consumption, shall be absolutely forbidden from carrying on their business at all, and their property is at once destroyed without compensation, without question; and then it goes further:

Nor shall the per diem capacity of any grain distillery be reduced below ten bushels.

* * * * * * *

And every distiller of grain who, after the 1st day of November, 1884, operates his distillery on a less capacity than ten bushels of grain per day, shall be liable to the fine, forfeitures, and imprisonment specified in section 3260 of the Revised Statutes.

Here is an absolute prohibition. If there is anything the American people do not like it is to be forbidden to do what is done elsewhere. The statement made by the Senator from North Carolina it seems to me is a proper one: if a Kentucky distiller or an Ohio distiller can manufacture five hundred gallons a day, why should not a distiller in the mountains, where money is less abundant, where the supply of grain is less, be allowed to make his ten gallons? Why discriminate against the poor in favor of the rich?

Mr. BECK. Allow me to make a suggestion to the Senator, in the line of his argument. There is a prohibition now against allowing any under four gallons. That has always been maintained. Why should that be maintained?

Mr. SHERMAN. The reason is, because experience has shown that so small a distillery as that is practically not profitable, and therefore that is a limit which we apply by law generally.

Mr. BECK. But the information we have now is that any distillery making under ten gallons a day is necessarily operated as a fraud.

Mr. SHERMAN. If we had the power of the British Parliament and if we could say that there should be only five distilleries in the United States of America, we could locate them at Cincinnati, Peoria, and the places where whisky is made in quantities; but we have never undertaken to exercise such a power. It would be better in one sense, and we could make all the whisky needed for commerce and for our own use in five or six distilleries and there collect the taxes with more certainty and with probably less expense than any other tax; but the whole sentiment of our people would rebel against such a thing as that. It would be a discrimination in favor of localities.

This proposition of the Committee on Appropriations would benefit Kentucky, Ohio, and Illinois, but it would be wrong to the distillers in all the States (including Pennsylvania) along the mountains. I would not like to stand up here advocating a proposition to benefit my own people and give them a monopoly of the whisky trade. It would not be right, and I would not do it.

The law now is operating pretty well. It is admitted on all hands that the whisky tax is collected with about as much certainty, with about as much security and with less cost than even your customs duties. Although in North Carolina, where it has to be watched very carefully, it costs a good deal, yet taking the whole country together the cost of the collection of the whisky tax is only from 2 to 3 per cent. Why not let the law alone? Why put an amendment to it on an appropriation bill which has to be passed every year? Why put it there for the purpose of disturbing this carefully examined machinery, and transfer from the Committee on Finance these questions, that have been studied over time and time again and solved and passed upon, and turn them over to the Committee on Appropriations in the last days of the session?

If the Senate of the United States could be presumed to be guilty of a supreme act of folly it seems to me this would be the one. I therefore propose to object to the Senate committee's proposition as being legislative, and I hope that the Senate will without much division strike out the House proposition and leave this question to be legislated upon in a proper and orderly manner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio makes the point of order that the Senate committee's amendment, the affirmative part of it, is general legislation.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator will reserve the point of order for the present.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will withdraw it for the purpose of enabling the Senator to discuss it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state as to the point of order that the language of the rule is, that "no amendment shall be received to which this objection applies." The Chair has some doubt as to whether the point can now be raised after the amendment without objection or any point being reserved has been opened for debate.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Kansas did at the very opening of the matter reserve it. He called my attention to it as he went out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without saying whether following the rule rigidly a point of order made after debate has opened would be in time, as the Chair is inclined to be liberal on a subject of that kind, the point of order for the present will be reserved.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the presiding officer that the Senator from Kansas at the beginning of this debate reserved the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That relieves the question of the difficulty suggested by the Chair.

Mr. BECK. I agree that something has to be done. While I do not want to vote for the House proposition, which is objectionable in many regards, it is not subject to a point of order. Are we to have no alternative but to reject altogether the House provision and allow the present condition of things to remain, or vote for the House proposition, which is not subject to the point of order? Therefore I will say a few words as to the reason why the committee proposed the change.

Much of what the Senator from North Carolina said is undoubtedly true as to the present condition of affairs. It is about as bad as it can be. But as one of the members of the Committee on Appropriations I thought the proposition of the House was too radical to allow all these small distilleries to run without any guard, if another and a better provision can be had.

The present law prohibits the licensing of any distillery unless it mashes four bushels a day. That is a prohibition just as much as for ten bushels, depending on what is the minimum quantity that should be required to be produced to bring it within the conditions of the public revenue. The distilling of whisky is not like the raising of tobacco. Whisky is not an agricultural product; tobacco is; and yet we do not allow a man who raises his tobacco to sell his crop to any one but a licensed dealer, and we impose a tax of $500 on every licensed tobacco dealer. We prohibit absolutely every man from becoming a licensed dealer in tobacco without paying that.

So to-day the man who raises tobacco is obliged to sell his crop to regular wholesale dealers. That was done because it was said the revenues of the country require us to do that, and if we did not do that the tobacco would be sold to Tom, Dick, and Harry, and the tax would be avoided altogether. Last winter we did allow the tobacco-raiser to sell his crop to the amount of $100 by a hard squeeze after ten or twelve years of struggle to give the little people who live at the head of the hollows an opportunity to swap for sugar the little product of their gardens. Beyond that the man who raises an agricultural product that he has as much right to raise as he has to raise wheat or corn or hay is because of the necessities of the revenue compelled to sell his product only to the wholesale dealer.

Whisky is not of that character. The corn, the rye, the potatoes, the wheat, or anything that is put into whisky can be put into hogs, can be put into cattle, can be put into many other things besides whisky. The limitation is fixed now at four bushels a day as the minimum at which we allow a distillery to run. Experience has shown, as the Senator from North Carolina has very well said, that that minimum of four bushels per day is productive of the grossest frauds; and it is admitted by the Revenue Department and must be known to the common observation of every man in the Senate that every one who distills less than ten bushels a day does not intend to carry on an honest business, and he can not make whisky unless he goes into partnership with the storekeeper or the gauger and makes more than the minimum we tax him for and sells the untaxed product clandestinely, all of which demoralizes trade, breaks down the morals of the community, makes men lawless, and causes loss to the revenue.

Out of the thousand and odd distilleries now running the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in a report made to us the other day, which I hold in my hand, gives the number of distilleries not exceeding ten bushels daily capacity in the following table:

Statement of the number of registered grain distilleries not exceeding twenty-five bushels' capacity in the United States during the year ended April 30, 1884.

It will be seen that there are 104 in my own State, 294 in the sixth district of North Carolina, 122 in the fifth district of North Carolina, 75 in Georgia, 30 in Virginia, and so on, making a total of 782 little distilleries out of an aggregate number running to a thousand and something that mash less than ten bushels a day, and every one of them is running at a loss to the Government, running as a fraudulent distillery, and no man can run such a distillery unless he is doing it in a combination such as the Senator from North Carolina has suggested; and at every one of these places there is a Government officer called a storekeeper, who is paid $3 per day, and a gauger is there, and all the machinery of collection. So it is extremely doubtful, if you can ascertain the facts accurately, which I have been unable to do, whether or not the Government gets as much money from these distilleries under ten bushels a day as it pays for collecting the tax.

MEMORANDUM.—The gaugers are only assigned during the fruit season.

On the 16th day of June I sent a note to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue asking for information on this subject, in these words:

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue will please advise the Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate, as to the number of registered grain distilleries in the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, giving—

First. The total product, the aggregate collection, and aggregate expenses of all those of capacity of twenty-five bushels and over.

Second. Giving the same facts relative to those from ten to twenty-five bushels.

Third. The same from five to ten bushels.

Fourth. The same under five bushels.

Sixth. The same facts as to fruit distilleries.

Seventh. State the total number of storekeepers, gaugers, and storekeeper-gaugers commissioned during the year, and the largest number assigned to duty and receiving pay at any one time.

That would have told us all about it, but I received a note saying it would take ten days to do it; it could not be done, and the information never was given; so I am unable except by general guess to state what the result would be. I thought I had brought the answer but I picked up the wrong paper. If that information had been given, as could have been done in my judgment in one day or certainly in two or surely long before this time, there would be no trouble in ascertaining all the facts we are now calling for, but it is painfully apparent that these distilleries that are now run under ten bushels per day are paying very little, if anything, more than the expense of running them.

If we can put a limitation of four bushels a day, why not of ten? Why shall we not say in this amendment that no collector shall authorize less than ten bushels just as we now say by the present law he shall not authorize less than four? If you do that you will cut off, as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shows by the report I hold in my hand, which was given to the committee the other day, seven hundred and eighty-two of these distilleries, with all their machinery, and you will get clear of much of the evil now complained of.

I am one of those who believe that the most legitimate tax that can be collected is the tax on whisky and tobacco; and I have a table prepared by myself, which I am unable to lay my hand on at this minute, showing that fifteen districts in the United States pay $53,000,000 out of the $74,000,000 now collected; and that the total cost in those districts does not exceed 1½ per cent., and in many of them not 1 per cent., while in the sixth district of North Carolina and in the eighth district of Kentucky and in districts in Tennessee and elsewhere the expenses of collection run from 18 to 45 per cent. It is true when you come to aggregate it all together the cost is only about 3½ or 4 per cent., yet it is less than 2 per cent. in fifteen of the large districts, embracing the sixth and seventh Kentucky, the first Illinois, the fifth Iowa, and others whose names I can not now recall, and $54,000,000 out of $74,000,000 is collected at a cost of less than 2 per cent., and in some of the larger districts at less than 1 per cent. The great expense is in the other districts.

Mr. MAXEY. I should like to understand this matter. Suppose that the tax is not imposed on these small distilleries using less than ten bushels to the day, would not this have the effect of inducing fraud by having those distilleries that consume ten, eleven, twelve, thirteen, or fourteen bushels a day report less than ten, and thus evade the tax altogether; would not that lead to fraud on the Treasury?

Mr. BECK. I do not know that I quite comprehend the Senator. Ten bushels a day is the minimum.

Mr. MAXEY. Suppose you make ten bushels a day the minimum. Under that there is no taxation.

Mr. BECK. No; under that there is no distillery allowed.

Mr. MAXEY. I did not understand that before.

Mr. BECK. That is the position our committee took, that the collector shall not license such a distillery, because whenever a man runs less than ten bushels a day, after he pays for his grain and pays for his machinery and the expense of running it, it is apparent that he can make no money.

Mr. MAXEY. I understand the position now.

Mr. BECK. Our position is that unless a man makes ten bushels a day he does not do it for legitimate purposes, and as we are collecting revenue from it and are obliged to protect those who are paying the revenue honestly, we must not allow any more frauds than we can possibly help to come in, and thus have untaxed whisky on the market.

The difference between the grain distiller and the fruit distiller is this: The fruit season only lasts a few weeks. Extra vigilance can be exercised during those few weeks to see how much whisky is made out of the fruit. The men who distill from fruit generally own large orchards and are men of respectability, of position, standing, and property. All these things operate as a guard on the fruit distiller. But when you turn to a little grain distillery of four or five bushels a day and put no guard over it, that can run the whole year around, and such concerns are generally run by men who are not responsible, who have nothing to collect anything from, and then they are turned over to the tender mercies of the revenue department. There is the difficulty we saw, and hence we said the present condition of things is intolerable and we seek to amend it, we seek to improve it. We do not want to strike poor men down, because any man, however poor he may be, who wants to go into that business will at least mash ten bushels a day. If he does not mash that much, he means not to go into the business at all to make money legitimately, but for the purpose of combining with the United States officers to commit fraud. We stopped all the small distilleries for many years, because for many years we required the distiller to pay the storekeeper $4 a day, and no man could run a ten-bushel house and pay the storekeeper $4 a day, and none ran.

That was said to be hard upon the poor people, that a man making a thousand gallons or five thousand gallons a day at Peoria or Louisville or in portions of Indiana could afford to pay $4 a day, but the small distiller could not. Congress listened to that appeal on behalf of the poor man and said very properly it was not well for Government officials to be paid by the men whom they watched, and the small distillers were handicapped by having to pay $4 a day when they only made a small quantity, whereas the large distillers hardly felt it. Therefore, we changed the law and made the Government pay the storekeeper $4 a day. That being done, little distilleries sprang up all over the country to take advantage, just as the Senator from North Carolina has stated, of that condition of things and go into partnership with the officers to commit frauds on the revenue.

That having been developed to the extent it has, I do not think anything remains except to say that a man shall not go into that business at all unless he mashes a sufficient amount to give some reasonable assurance that he is going into the business honestly.

We went as much as anything else upon the report of the Senator from North Carolina, which I wish he had read, and which I believe I will either read or hand to the Reporter with the permission of the Senate to be inserted as part of my remarks. Perhaps I had better do that to save the time of the Senate. It shows the proof, the page, the names of the witnesses verifying every fact that he stated, and quite a number of others. The Senate will say whether I shall read it or not. I believe that I will assume that I have permission to do so. But one part of it is worth reading:

Indeed so obvious—

Says the Senator from North Carolina in his report—

were the advantages to the distiller of obtaining this division with the storekeeper that many who were originally running distilleries of eight, ten, and twelve bushels capacity immediately divided them into smaller ones in order to get more storekeepers. (See testimony of Commissioner Raum, part 1, pages 310, 311.)

Then he tells how the surplus was kept, and he gives the testimony of numerous witnesses with the pages where the testimony can be found, all of which may be useful, and that is the reason why, without adding additional force to what he has said in that regard, I will ask to have this made part of my remarks:

After many years of this vexatious state of half-warfare between the Government and these hardly treated people, an amnesty was proclaimed in 1876 for all offenses against the revenue laws, and the Department undertook to coax men into the business of legal distilling. They were permitted to establish and operate distilleries with capacities as low as seven gallons per day; to divide indefinitely the larger into smaller ones, and storekeepers were assigned to them, agreeable to the distillers, often of their selection. (See part 2, testimony of Riley Talent, pages 239, 240; L. A. Bristol, page 85; W. A. Clontz, page 3.) Under this arrangement great changes took place throughout the State. More than 1,400 licensed distilleries were registered by 1881, at least eight hundred of which were in the sixth district.

The distillers at once became the favorites of the Government, and were treated with the utmost consideration. "Blockading" went out of fashion, and is now comparatively abandoned. But the public dislike to the system continued and continues unabated. The suspicion went abroad that the illicit distillers had simply gone into partnership with the revenue officers; and reflecting men believed that public demoralization was greater even than under the previous régime. How well founded this belief was will be seen by the disclosures made by the testimony herewith submitted.

The number of officers was increased indefinitely. From year to year they grew larger, until in 1881 there were on duty, as shown by the official records, 427, besides those who held commissions, but who were not assigned to duty, amounting to probably half as many more. At no time since 1880 could there have been less than 600 men connected with the service in that single district. The expenses of collection of course kept pace with this increase of officials until 1881, when they reached the sum of $268,324, being over 54 per cent. of the collections, which amounted to 499,455. When to this is added the cost of all legal proceedings paid under another head, the amount of which the committee was not able to obtain, the cost of collection for that year would not be far from 75 per cent. (see Raum's testimony, part 1, page 311). The testimony taken was mostly that of revenue officials themselves, or distillers, and of course was given under duress to some extent of official displeasure of their superiors. Nevertheless enough was obtained to develop an amount of laxity, incompetency, and fraud, sufficient to call for rigid reformation or the entire abolition of the system as applied to small distilleries. A reference to some of the more salient things will furnish an idea of the manner in which the revenue laws are administered there.

It is proved that the practice of storekeepers dividing their pay with distillers prevails to a very great extent. Sometimes this arrangement was made before the distilling was started. It was a very simple transaction indeed. A storekeeper with a commission in his pocket would have no assignment, and was therefore earning nothing; he would propose to a neighbor that if he would start a distillery and have him assigned as storekeeper he would give him half his pay, either in cash or as board. As it would not take more than from $100 to $200 to start a four-bushel distillery, this was often done. (See testimony of W. G. Bogle, part 1, page 2; J. C. Barkley, pages 16 and 18; M. C. Williams, page 20; A. D. Cowles, pages 11 and 12; Thomas Templeton, pages 32 and 33; A. H. Brooks, pages 131 and 135; Tyre Glenn, page 124; T. K. Bruner, pages 212, 213, and 214; J. T. McIntosh, page 164; A. T. Davidson, page 428; A. C. Avery, page 444. Part 2: W. B. McDowell, pages 5 and 6; J. H. Craig, pages 28 and 32; W. K. Gibbs, page 34; J. M. Howard, pages 41, 42, 43, 44, and 45; P. M. Mull, pages 132, 135, 136, 137, 138, and 145; Terrill Hudson, page 216; N. L. Chapman, page 242; J. A. Pasour, page 280; Rufus Dobson, page 304; C. Pasour, pages 362, 363; H. H. Martin, page 400; R. O. Costner, page 432; A. A. Stroup, pages 390 and 391.)

This may be considered as the foundation of all the other fraudulent practices. When a distillery was in operation the distiller would often demand of the storekeeper part of his pay, and would threaten to suspend business if the demand was refused; for he could suspend at any time without serious inconvenience, and, in fact, often did suspend, in which case the storekeeper's pay ceased also. (See testimony, part 1, of J. T. McIntosh, page 164; T. K. Bruner, pages 213 and 214. Part 2, W. B. McDowell, pages 5 and 6; J. H. Craig, page 28; W. K. Gibbs, page 34; J. H. Howard, page 42; J. A. Pasour, page 280; Rufus Dobson, page 330; W. F. Holland, page 300; H. H. Martin, page 400; P. W. Jenkins, pages 412 and 413.)

Both distiller and storekeeper being thus guilty of violation of law, they were mutually in each other's power, and the door was opened for numberless frauds. Prominent among these were that in many cases the storekeepers and distillers kept no books, or none sufficient; that storekeepers did not weigh or measure the meal or grain used by the distillers, but permitted the latter to help themselves, and to "mash in" falsely by every conceivable method. (See testimony, part 2, of J. A. Pasour, page 279; W. E. Smith, pages 284, 287, 288; J. A. Tritt, pages 290 and 295; Rufus Dobson, pages 301, 302, 303; C. Pasour, pages 363, 365, 366; A. Cloninger, pages 370, 373, 378; J. A. Shrum, pages 382, 383; A. A. Stroup, page 389; H. H. Martin, pages 400 and 403; M. H. Costner, page 406.)

Agent after agent reported their belief of these abuses, and urged that as a remedy the storekeepers should be changed every sixty days. The supervisor of that State did once so order, but after the abolition of those officers the old abuse was returned to and renewed with thrift and vigor. (See evidence, part 1, report of Revenue Agent Tracie, pages 500 to 506, inclusive; testimony of C. L. Cook, part 1, pages 456 and 460.)

Another fraud that inevitably followed this guilty partnership was, that after the minimum quantity of whisky permitted by law from a bushel of grain was drawn off and put in the warehouse for taxation, the surplus beyond the minimum was left to the distiller untax-paid. (See testimony, part 1, report of Revenue Agent Tracie, page 502. Part 2: J. H. Craig, pages 28 and 29; J. A. Pasour, pages 278, 279, and 284; W. E. Smith, page 285; J. A. Tritt, page 291; Rufus Dobson, pages 301, 302; C. Pasour, pages 362, 366; A. Cloninger, pages 371, 372, 380; J. A. Shrum, pages 383, 384; A. A. Stroup, page 389; H. H. Martin, pages 400, 401; and M. H. Costner, pages 406 and 409.)

This minimum was two gallons to the bushel. Under ordinary circumstances, and with honest "mashing in," from two and a half to three gallons was the usual product; but under the dishonest methods of "mashing" the surplus often exceeded the minimum capacity. One distiller swore in particular that at his distillery, the capacity of which was assessed at forty-eight gallons per week, he frequently made one hundred gallons, of which fifty-two paid no tax. (See testimony of W. E. Smith, part 2, page 285.) Another, that at a distillery the capacity of which was seventy gallons per week he made one hundred and thirty gallons, sixty gallons of which paid no tax. (See testimony of J. Pasour, part 2, page 282.) Indeed, so obvious were the advantages to the distiller of obtaining this division with the storekeeper that many who were originally running distilleries of eight, ten, and twelve bushels capacity immediately divided them into smaller ones in order to get more storekeepers. (See testimony of Commissioner Raum, part 1, pages 310, 311.)

This surplus and untaxed spirits was not only sold privately in the neighborhood, but was shipped abroad in large quantities in kegs of less than five gallons, which did not require a stamp. (See testimony of J. H. Craig, part 2, pages 28, 29.) In one county in which there were some forty or fifty registered distilleries, the opinion of intelligent men was that not more than two-thirds of the whisky paid tax, as the following extract from the testimony of J. H. Craig, a man of standing in the county of Gaston, North Carolina, and found in part 2, page 29, shows:

Q. Have you any opinion as to the amount of whisky made in Gaston county that pays no tax?

A. My opinion is there is at least one-third of it. That is my honest opinion.

Q. That pays no tax?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is there as much now, in your opinion, as there was when blockading was more common?

A. As much unbranded?

Q. Yes.

A. I think a great deal more.

Q. Than when blockaders were in full swing?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is that opinion of yours sustained by other men of judgment there?

A. I have heard different men express themselves that way.

Q. Men who are competent to know?

A. I think so. I have heard of men expressing themselves, who were in it before and then went in according to law, that this is much the best way; they did not have the fear of being pulled about in the old way; "they thought they knew it before, but did not know it right."

Q. The opinion is this: that there is more untaxed-paid whisky made in your county than there was before the introduction of small stills?

A. I have heard men who ought to be cognizant of it say there is a great deal more whisky made, and more sold without any tax, than before they went at it according to law.

So also distillers were frequently permitted to carry the keys of the storekeepers, and any number of them procured possession, by one means or another, of the keys of the storekeepers and had them counterfeited, by which means they had at all times access to the cistern-rooms and warehouses of their distilleries. (See part 2, testimony of Joseph Huffman, page 22; J. H. Craig, pages 27, 30, 31; J. A. Pasour, pages 279, 283; W. E. Smith, page 286; J. A. Tritt, page 292; C. Pasour, page 362; A. Cloninger, page 373; A. Rhyne, page 305; A. A. Stroup, page 389; M. H. Costner, page 406; R. O. Costner, page 432.) That scarcely a distillery in the district was prepared as required by law, thus increasing the opportunity for fraud indefinitely. (See reports, part 1, of revenue agents, James W. Ballard, page 499; T. C. Tracie, pages 500 to 506; J. E. Hetherington, page 533; E. Latham, pages 545, 546, 547; H. B. Burgh, 554, 555, 556.)

We are driven either to permit the present condition of things to remain or to adopt some modification. The point of order may make some of us vote for the House provision as better than the present condition, rather than submit to going on as we are now.

Another evil which the Senator from North Carolina referred to is an intolerable one, the commissioning a large number of men and holding them in the service of the Government when they are not employed and not expected to be employed, and not needed and not pretended to be needed. That we remedy in the Senate amendment by saying they shall not have more than 15 per cent. above those actually needed. Some percentage will be necessary. Why? Because when a distillery is running to its full capacity, making 5,000 gallons a day with a full force, they may reduce it down to 2,000. The distiller may give notice at a moment's warning that he will resume working to his full capacity again, because he gauges his production by what he can sell. Some man may be incompetent, some man may be a drunkard, some storekeeper may be sick, and therefore some margin must be given.

While I thought 10 per cent. would perhaps be enough, the Commissioner thought it should be 15 per cent., and we allowed 15; but in his communication sent to us on the 13th of June the Commissioner shows that he had in the fifth district of North Carolina one hundred and four men in commission and only fifty-four under assignment; that he had in the sixth district of North Carolina three hundred and twenty-one men under commission and only one hundred and eighty-four assigned. What is the meaning of that? He commissions double and in many instances treble the number of men he wants or ever will or can need, and he does this: He will give one man employment for three months, another for two months, a third for three months, a fourth for three months. One hundred and eight dollars a month for three months would be $324 which he pays to these men. It is more than they can make for a year's services in the mountain part of North Carolina and other States, and they are glad to get it, and all are party hacks, and they are made to contribute to the collector for campaign expenses. He has four men in commission where but one is needed, and is dividing up with them four times a year, making four men do one man's work, keeping them in commission when he never intends to have them employed or only a part of the time, and then to have their services for political purposes. This was the condition developed beyond all doubt. It ought not to exist.

There is, as I have said, no more legitimate tax than the tax on whisky and tobacco. The people do not complain of it. They would rather pay tax on their whisky and tobacco than they would on their shoes, stockings, clothes, sugar, and the necessaries of life. But they complain of the way in which this law is administered, that under pretense of collecting the tax in these mountain districts there are hundreds of men kept in commission and paid out of the Treasury of the United States who do nothing for the pay they are receiving, who are aggravating the whole community.

The ten-bushel houses, of which as I said there are according to the Commissioner's own statement 782 out of a total number running of not less than 1,100, require the machinery to be kept up, the mode of collecting bringing the whole internal-revenue system into disrepute and making men clamor for a total abolition of the whole system, to get clear of the tax on whisky and tobacco when it is not the tax they are seeking to get clear of, but the system under which it is collected, and the abuses of that system as now carried on.

Here is an honest effort on the part of the House, and I think a more intelligent one on the part of the Senate committee, to correct these abuses and to show that a system which from distilled spirits produces $74,000,000 a year, every dollar of which goes into the Treasury of the United States—deducting less than 2 per cent. for collection, which would be the amount if these ten-bushel distilleries were all removed—is the best tax that can be imposed on a people. But if we are to pay $190,000 in the sixth district of North Carolina, if we are to pay from fifty to sixty thousand dollars in other districts where there is hardly that much revenue collected, and we know that that is used for corruption purposes, it disgusts the people with the entire system and makes them clamor for the abolition of it all because they feel the abuses without knowing how easily the tax could be collected under a decently fair system.

I suppose if the point of order is made it will be made not in the interest of economy, not in the interest of revenue, not in the interest of good government, but in the interest of the worst set of political bummers that ever were held together under any system. The point may be made and the Chair may be compelled to sustain it, and the system may have to go on, and perhaps it will. But there is one provision in the House clause that can not go out on a point of order, and I hope it will be maintained, and that is this:

Provided, That special warehouses may be established by the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he may cause to be deposited the product of any number of said distilleries, to be designated by him by his order, and in which any of said distillers may deposit his product, and when so deposited shall be subject to all the laws and regulations as to bonds, tax, removal, and otherwise as is now provided by law for other warehouses.

Under the present system the Commissioner has the right to allow ten gallons of whisky to remain in a distillery warehouse and pay a man three or four dollars a day for watching it. That distiller has a right, if the Commissioner of Internal Revenue does not order it away, to have it remain there three years and he will pay four times the amount to a man to sit and watch ten gallons of whisky in a warehouse than the tax on the whisky amounts to, and under the present law he is compelled if there are fifty barrels remaining in warehouse to allow it to remain there for the whole three years if the distiller sees fit to have it kept there, and he can not help himself.

What is the result of that? I have made that calculation. Unless it is reduced to 2,000 gallons, even the Commissioner can not send it to another warehouse. It may be in a log warehouse, it may be in a place that can be set on fire, if it is burned or destroyed the Government gets no tax; if it is stolen it gets nothing, and there are plenty of places where there will be found water instead of whisky in the barrels in warehouse in the mountain districts. But if a man makes 2,000 gallons or fifty barrels in six months and stops and reports no more, says "I will not make more, but hold that fifty barrels," he must have a storekeeper at three or four dollars a day, as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue sees fit to allow him, to stay in that warehouse until three years expire, when he is obliged to take it out; and what is the result? The total tax upon that fifty barrels of forty gallons to the barrel, making 2,000 gallons, at 90 cents, is $1,800. The leakage for three years is a discount of 15 per cent. The net amount received by the Government would be $1,530. At $4 a day for a man to sit and watch it the Government would pay out $3,650, or $2,120 more than the tax received. Under the present law as it stands the distiller has the right to keep it there, and to have that storekeeper paid $4 a day to sit and watch it for two years and six months after he closes his distillery, assuming that he makes fifty barrels the first six months. The House says that is an outrage, and I say it is an outrage. No law ought to permit it.

When we allow whisky to be taken in bond for export to be carried from place to place over the country and delivered to mechanical and scientific institutions, allow it to be carried from one distillery warehouse to another if the Commissioner of Internal Revenue does not think it is in a safe warehouse, what risk can there be in carrying the product of twenty or thirty or forty small distilleries, watched by forty storekeepers at three or four dollars a day each, to a fire-proof warehouse on some railroad at a county seat convenient for it to be shipped, in a place where it is not liable to be destroyed by fire and the Government tax lost, where a single storekeeper can watch the product of all, instead of keeping forty storekeepers to watch forty little log warehouses? What harm, I ask, can come from that? The House proposes to do that.

Two years ago the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Raum, prepared a bill and sent it to the Senate, and the Senate passed it authorizing that to be done, and he accompanied his recommendation with a letter which I hope I can find. I did not expect to debate this matter and I did not bring all the papers I otherwise would have done, but I have that. Commissioner Raum said to Congress, accompanying the bill he sent authorizing these warehouses:

> The establishment and use of special bonded warehouses, as provided for in the second and other sections of the bill, is a feature which I think can properly be looked upon with favor. These warehouses would no doubt be established by men of means and business standing, at important points of trade, where transportation would be easy, and would be constructed as nearly as possible fire-proof. To these warehouses would be sent, by direction of the Commissioner, under section 3272, United States Revised Statutes, the spirits in warehouses which were deemed insecure, and, under the provisions of the present bill the spirits in warehouses where the distilleries had been suspended for a year and upward.

It ought to be for a month or a portion of it.

> To them would also be taken, on the application of the distiller, the spirits produced at small establishments, remote from railroad or other important lines of transportation, to the great advantage of the small manufacturers, who would thus be enabled to insure their goods at low rates, to obtain loans upon their warehouse receipts without difficulty, and to deliver their goods, when sold, to their customers without unnecessary delay in transportation. These warehouses would be under the control of the collectors and in the custody of storekeepers, and in my opinion the interests of the Government, as well as the convenience of the trade, would be promoted by their establishment.
> In conclusion I will state that, in my opinion, the provisions of the bill extending the bonded period, allowing leakage, and authorizing the establishment of bonded warehouses, are judicious, and will work beneficially to the Government, the manufacturers, and the trade, and I think that the proposition of an annual warehouse bond is a good one. The proposed reduction of the penal sum of the warehousing bonds may be considered as endangering the interests of the Government. I venture the opinion that if Congress in its wisdom sees fit to adopt this branch of the bill it can be administered so as to protect the interests of the Government.
> I have the honor to be, very respectfully,
> GREEN B. RAUM, Commissioner.

If nothing else is done, that ought to be done. It would pay the Government hundreds of thousands of dollars, and save the payment of hundreds of useless employés who are now, under pretense of watching little log-warehouse distilleries, getting $3 or $4 a day, when one intelligent man at one concentrated warehouse would guard the interest of the honest distiller and the interest of the Government, and, as Mr. Raum says, to the advantage of all.

I do not believe the point of order ought to be raised against the amendment of the Senate committee. I do not believe the House bill as it came to us ought to be adopted, if it can be helped, abolishing all supervision over small distilleries. I do not believe that any distillery of a capacity under ten bushels is open with the intention of being honestly conducted; and I believe particularly that the special warehouses recommended by the House ought to be adopted, as the former Commissioner said, and as I believe the present Commissioner agrees with him, would be for the interest of all concerned.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask leave at this time to offer a resolution in order that it may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent to offer a resolution at this time. The Chair hears no objection to its being received. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> Ordered, That during the remainder of the present session of the Senate it shall be in order to move at any time that debate on any amendment or all amendments to any appropriation bill then before the Senate be limited to five minutes for each Senator, and that no Senator shall speak more than once on the same amendment in form or substance. The question on such motions shall be determined without debate.

Mr. BECK. I object to the consideration of that now.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not propose to consider it now. I merely offer it. I will say to the Senator from Kentucky that it has been usual, I believe, at the close of every session to have such an order.

Mr. BECK. We have the sundry-civil bill yet to consider, and no man can tell what is in it or what may be offered to it.

Mr. ALLISON. The order does not apply to this bill unless the Senate adopt it. There is no order now by which we can have a five-minute debate on any amendment, as I understand. This is merely to authorize a five-minute rule on an amendment or on a whole bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution has been received.

Mr. HARRIS. Is the resolution intended to apply to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. ALLISON. It does not apply to it now. If the Senator from Kentucky will examine this resolution he will see that there is no harm in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be printed and go over.

The Chair understood the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to say that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] had raised a point of order when the pending amendment was read.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Kansas did raise the point of order at that time; and I desire to say one thing with reference to this point of order. Of course I do not know what the rule ought to be, but merely desire to make a suggestion to the Chair.

The House of Representatives sent to us a provision relating to the regulation of small distilleries. The Senate Committee on Appropriations believe that that is an unwise provision, aside from the question of legislation on appropriation bills, and therefore they have inserted in lieu of that provision another which they believe will be more effectual to accomplish any just object that ought to be accomplished with reference to this question. That is all I desire to say on that point. Ours is an amendment to a House amendment, and if it is to be ruled that no amendment to a House amendment can be presented here, then of course we are in a box, compelled to assent to whatever the House sends to us or to reject it absolutely. We have no power of revision or amendment over the House provision.

I merely call the attention of the Senate to this situation without expressing any opinion as to what the just rule ought to be.

Mr. PLATT. It is hardly an amendment to a House amendment. It is an amendment to the bill which the House sends to us. I suppose that is what the Senator meant to say.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLATT. I find that in the appropriation bills which have come over from the House, there is quite a considerable amount of general legislation, and I think we ought to strike it out in almost all instances, not only in this bill, but in other bills which have come to us. I do not wish the Senate to put itself in the position of trying to ingraft any legislation upon a general appropriation bill. I believe it better that we should strike out what comes to us from the House. I do not know anything about the point of order; but if the point of order lies upon this, I hope it will be insisted upon.

Mr. ALLISON. I beg to be indulged in saying a very few words, as I should like to get a vote on this amendment this evening. I desire to say a word in response to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who is not in his seat at this moment, in regard to the amendment proposed by the Senate Committee on Appropriations and the public policy of that amendment.

The Senator from Ohio says that it is not wise for us to prohibit in any way any legitimate business or occupation in this country. That as a general rule, perhaps, is a sound one; but we have done that thing over and over again. Many years ago, you will remember, we passed a law taxing State banks 10 per cent. on their circulation. What was that but prohibition? And on this very question of distilled spirits, in 1868, when the principal tax law in regard thereto was passed, there was a practical prohibition of all small distilleries. Prior to the passage of the law of 1868 we had a tax of $2 a gallon upon distilled spirits and a revenue from that source of $14,000,000 per annum. Every one knew that there was fraud without limitation in the distillation of whisky and in the management of that tax. So the law of 1868 undertook to put around the whisky business such restrictions and limitations as would enable this Government to realize a large revenue from distilled spirits, while the tax was reduced from $2 to 50 cents a gallon, and other indirect taxes were imposed, making it amount to 60 cents on the gallon, and a tax was placed on every still of $2 a day, whether that distillery ran or did not run, and every distillery that did run was bound to have a storekeeper by the side of that distillery, who was authorized to be paid either $4 or $5 per day. That was paid out of the Treasury of the United States in the first instance, but the distiller himself was bound to reimburse the Government of the United States for the cost of that storekeeper.

So, then, although there was no direct prohibition in the law of 1868, as amended in 1869 there was a complete and absolute prohibition against all small distilleries, and by gradual changes in the law these restrictions and limitations were uncovered from time to time. The distillers who were compelled to pay storekeepers were relieved from that payment in 1872, so that the Government of the United States paid directly out of the Treasury all the cost of storekeepers; but there has never been a time, and I want to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to this fact, since 1868 and since the great frauds were perpetrated upon the Government with reference to distilled spirits that any committee of either House of Congress was willing to leave a distillery, whether small or great, without the presence of a storekeeper, whose duty it should be to guard and protect the Government at that distillery, and see from day to day and from hour to hour what the distiller was doing. That has been the uniform rule.

Mr. VANCE. Do not the fruit distillers distill now without a storekeeper standing by to see what they are doing?

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly they do; and the very law of 1868 which I described a moment ago exempted distillers of fruit brandy, whether made from apples, peaches, or grapes, from the operation of that law. Why was that done? It was done because everybody knew that the distillation of fruit must be in the very nature of things a temporary matter. For instance, if a man distills brandy from peaches, how long can he distill in any neighborhood brandy from peaches? It can not be done, in the nature of things, beyond two or three weeks. So of apples; so of grapes. The season regulates that; and during the season of distillation for grapes or peaches of course there is a surveillance over these distilleries, and then they go out of existence until the fruit crop comes in again. Am I right in that? The Senator has such distilleries in his State.

Mr. VANCE. It seems to me the shorter time the distiller would have to run the greater would be his exertion to commit all the fraud he could while he was running.

Mr. ALLISON. Very likely.

Mr. VANCE. I can not see why he should not commit as much fraud pro tanto while he was running two or three months distilling fruit as while running all the year round distilling grain.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course the Senator from his standpoint may think that pro tanto there is as much fraud, and I am sorry to say that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue rather agrees with him in the statement that there is a great deal of fraud in the distillation of brandy from fruit, although the season is necessarily short.

Mr. VANCE. The Senator, I hope, will do me and the distillers of brandy and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the justice to say that there is not near the complaint of the fruit-brandy distillers that there is of the grain distillers.

Mr. ALLISON. That is true, of course. That is true everywhere, in the nature of things. The distillation of brandy from fruits must be in a degree an open distillation. You can not conceal the transportation of these heavy products from the orchard to the distillery, and, as I said before, the season is brief.

I have some sympathy with the Senator from North Carolina in his hostility to the internal-revenue laws as applied to distilled spirits. I would regret exceedingly to be compelled to stand upon this floor and admit for my constituents what the Senator from North Carolina admits in reference to his constituents, and I regret to say that nearly all the troubles we have had with regard to these small distilleries came from North Carolina. Why, Mr. President, it is a notorious fact that in the sixth district of North Carolina there have been from the very beginning of this law frauds without number and almost without limit. Men have been murdered by the fifties in attempting to enforce the law in the fifth and sixth districts of North Carolina, and I have before me the report of the Senator from North Carolina, made by himself less than two years ago, in which he discloses a most melancholy and disgraceful tale in reference to the distillers in North Carolina, and they are not small in number. There are to-day in the sixth district of North Carolina alone, I believe, over six hundred distillers who distill from grain and distill less than ten bushels per day to the distillery. I want to ask the Senator why it is that in the mountains of North Carolina, where corn naturally can not grow as it must grow upon the plains of Iowa and of Indiana and the other States of this Union, it has become so immensely profitable for men to plant ten-bushel or four-bushel or six-bushel distilleries? It is, in the very nature of things, a fraud upon the revenue, and it is known to be a fraud upon the revenue. While I admit that there may be officers there who are implicated in the fraud, it is none the less a fraud on the part of the people of those districts who are in connivance with the officers of the Government by which they defraud the tax-payers of this country of their lawful revenue.

Mr. President, as is stated in this very report, these men in North Carolina to-day are distilling by a compromise with the Government, and the very terms of the compromise—and I am sorry the Senator from Ohio is not here—were in one sense a fraud on the distillers of the whole country outside of North Carolina. It is a well-known fact that grain distillers can distill from each bushel of grain three gallons of whisky; and yet for the purpose of compromising with these moonshiners in North Carolina the Commissioner of Internal Revenue authorized surveys to be made whereby the distilleries in North Carolina should be confined to two gallons per bushel, and that is the rule in that State, I am told, to this day; and the Senator from North Carolina says that although the surveys authorized two gallons per bushel these men actually manufactured three gallons per bushel. And yet the Senator from North Carolina in his State proposes to throw open the doors and throw down the bars and let these people in North Carolina manufacture distilled spirits to the utmost extent without any surveillance whatever, as provided in the thirty-fifth title of our United States laws. If we could confine that clause to those two districts I do not know whether I should not be willing to get rid of North Carolina once and for all in that regard.

But while we are doing this we are opening a trap-way whereby $74,000,000 of taxes, which last year were collected from distilled spirits, will be gradually melted away in the fraudulent distilleries that will not only then exist in North Carolina but in every State of this Union, because if a man without restriction and limitation of the law can establish a distillery in North Carolina of ten bushels per day at a cost of $150, I do not believe the people of the other States of the Union are so virtuous that they will not imitate the bad example.

Then, instead of having this particular wrong which is so depicted and described by the Senator from North Carolina, in those two districts alone, we should have this fraud and wrong spread over the entire Union; and instead of collecting the $74,000,000 which we now collect from distilled spirits and pay into the Treasury, we should have it gradually wasted away until we found ourselves in the condition we were in in 1868, when with a nominal tax of $2 a gallon we only collected $14,000,000 per annum. That is the thing that the Senator from North Carolina and this House provision invite us to. If the Senate are disposed thus to open the door to fraud, not only in the fifth and sixth districts of North Carolina, but throughout the United States, then they will keep the provision sent to us by the House of Representatives where it is.

Mr. President, I do not care to occupy time with reference to the amendment. I only state what will be the result of the adoption of the House provision, and in this I may say that the committee concurs, so far as I know, without a dissenting voice, and for that reason I antagonize it with a proposition stringent in its nature with reference to the small distilleries.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa says he would be very sorry to say of his people what I have said of mine. I am responsible to the people whom I represent for what I have said. In my report made to the Senate two years ago I spoke advisedly. I spoke advisedly to-day; and I had reference to that portion of our people only who were capable of being corrupted by the officials of the Republican party representing the Government of the United States. I am sorry and ashamed to say that there are any there at all who could thus be corrupted, but it is so, sir. The frauds to which I adverted in my report, and to which I alluded to-day, were perpetrated by the corrupting influences and teachings of the agents of the party of the Senator. Those corrupt agents are the ones that we desire to get rid of.

It is not the tax that we object to, as was well and truthfully said by the Senator from Kentucky. We care nothing about the tax. A reasonable tax on whisky and tobacco is a proper and legitimate one. I know of no subject of taxation more proper than those. But it is the system that we object to. It is the corrupt and corrupting horde of office-holders, who are maintained upon us like the Egyptian locusts, of the Republican party to the injury of our people. It is not for the purpose of opening the door to any further frauds that we desire this relief; it is for the purpose of closing the door against the power and the administration of those frauds by the agents of the Government which the party of the Senator sends down upon us. That is what we object to, sir; for if there was any man desirous of committing fraud in North Carolina or anywhere else he could find no safer means of indulging in that propensity than by taking into partnership such men as represent the Government in the State of North Carolina.

Those men, I wish the Senator to understand, as I have no doubt he does, constitute the leaders of his party in my State. They are the men with whom he associates when he meets in national convention. They are the men to whom he looks for advice and counsel when seeking how to carry the elections in my part of the country. They are "hail fellows, well met," and I am sorry that he does not take more pains to defend them than he has done here to-day. I am sure that if I employed a set of fraudulent office-holders to stand by my party as those do by his, I should have the manliness to say some word of justification in their behalf, and would not absolutely surrender them to the tender mercies of the enemy when the pinch comes, as he has done. I would not accept their iniquity and deny them, as he does.

Mr. MORRILL. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. VANCE. Sir, this matter cannot be plainer. The true secret is that gentlemen on that side do not want to spare their political allies in the coming election. That is where the shoe pinches. So long as they can be made useful as political bummers to override the sentiment of the decent people of North Carolina, so long do I expect to see them maintained in full power and authority; and report after report, by committee after committee, might be made to the Senate piling up the grievances of their practices mountain high, and it would have no effect.

As I said before, we have no desire to escape the taxes except in the event that we can escape this army of officers in no other way. Then we desire to burn the whole barn for the sake of getting rid of the rats. That is the position that the people of North Carolina occupy in relation to it.

Now, the House of Representatives has sent to us a bill providing a means of getting rid, not of all, but of the greater number of the useless portion of these corrupt men. When I say that, I want to speak within limits. They are not all corrupt, though great portions of them are politically. I say the House of Representatives has sent us this provision, showing us the way by which we can get rid of these men without doing any damage to the Treasury of the United States. I think that all persons who are sincerely desirous of reforming the service of the country and wiping out any scandalous corruptions that exist ought to take the provision that came to us from the House or give us something better.

To crush out all small distilleries, as I said in my first remarks, I do not think would be right or just toward men who are not able to run larger distilleries. It would be one way, it is true, but I do not think it is the proper and honest way to face a great political evil like this; but the way is to shut the door in the face of these officers who thus abuse the powers of the Government, and cut off the source of corruption in that manner.

Why it is that a man should be treated as a scoundrel necessarily who undertakes to distill grain I never could understand. There are no other people in this Government who are required to be watched by a Government spy all the time in all their transactions in order to collect the taxes from them. The men who distill fruit are not so required to be watched. They are treated as though they could be trusted, and pay their taxes as other honest men, and the amount that they owe may be rendered upon oath, as all other men who pay taxes to the Government do, I believe, without exception. But whenever a man undertakes to distill grain he is henceforth treated as a scoundrel, and another scoundrel is paid to sit down and watch him. That is the way the whole thing runs in the State of North Carolina and everywhere else that these small distilleries prevail.

As to the amount of fraud perpetrated down there I claim that in the aggregate it is very small. In the number of instances it may be great, but more fraud can be perpetrated and has been perpetrated in one great distillery in the Northwest at one single venture than has been perpetrated in all the time since the United States imposed the internal-revenue law upon the Southern country by the small distillers in that country. They do things on a big scale in that part of the country. In the South it is different. I take occasion to say that even those of our people there who combined with the officers of the Government are no worse than the people are anywhere else. They are no better and no worse. I have no other apology or explanation to make with regard to the charges that I made in my report against those who combined with the Government officers in North Carolina.

We want some redress, sir. We must have some redress from the iniquities and the disturbances and the outrages that are perpetrated upon the people in my State and in various portions of the mountain country of the South. The Government of the United States does not need this little revenue.

I have every reason to believe, and I do believe, and I so assert, that if men are treated as though they were to be trusted they will prove more worthy of that confidence than if they are surrounded by paid spies and informers all the time. I believe that if they were treated as though they were honest men they would show, all of them, more of honest respect for the Government than they do under this espionage. I believe that there would be no more frauds perpetrated by the small grain distillers of the South and of the mountainous regions of this country than there is now perpetrated, or has been perpetrated, by the fruit distillers; and the Senator acknowledged that there was very little complaint of any fraud committed by the fruit distillers in this country. There is no reason why there should be. There is no reason or logic in the assertion that one occupation is not quite as reputable as the other. There is no reason in morals or in logic why the distiller of grain, rye or wheat, as the case may be, should be more dishonest than one who distills apples, peaches, or grapes; and the fact that the season is not so long for the distillation does not touch the general principle asserted. It only seems to me, as I interpolated into the remarks of the Senator, that if a dishonest man intended to perpetrate fraud and only had a short season in which to do it, he would hasten all the more his action in respect to that fraud.

Now, sir, the Senate can and will do as it pleases about this matter. I have had a great interest for many years in trying to redress the grievances of my people. I have been trying to wipe out this scandal upon our political system which grows out of the system of internal-revenue taxation in my part of the country. I have tried to do it earnestly, and I want to see the record made up. I want to see those who are in favor of doing something for that to say so; and I want to see those who are in favor of continuing that army of officers upon the people of this country for the production of little or no revenue, but for political purposes only, who are retained and paid out of the Treasury—I want to see them say so upon the record; and then if there is no redress to be granted, the people of my part of the country will know who is to blame for it.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I should like to make some remarks on this question. We came here, however, at 11 o'clock this morning; the weather is excessively hot; it is now 6 o'clock. I should prefer, as my remarks may be of some little length, not to make them this evening, and I ask the chairman of the committee whether he is willing to agree to an adjournment?

Mr. ALLISON. I will consent to an adjournment now.

Mr. BROWN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 25, 1884.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. A. F. STEELE, of Washington, D. C.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FRENCH AND AMERICAN CLAIMS COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

In answer to resolution of the House of Representatives of the 7th instant, making an inquiry regarding the expenditure of moneys appropriated by Congress to meet the expenses of the French and American Claims Commission, I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State upon the subject.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, June 24, 1884.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. CLEMENTS to withdraw from the files of the House papers accompanying H. R. 3977, for the relief of A. McLaughlin, there being no adverse report.

TESTIMONY BEFORE COMMITTEE ON RIVERS AND HARBORS.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors was granted leave to have printed certain testimony of Captain Eads and others taken before said committee.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. BEACH to print additional remarks upon the sundry civil appropriation bill, relating to the appropriation for the improvement and protection of the Yellowstone National Park [See Appendix.]

EIGHT-HOUR LAW, ETC.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, June 28, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be set apart for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6541) relative to the eight-hour law, and the bill (H. R. 995) relative to convict labor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SINGLETON. I object unless it is made subject to previous orders.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the morning hour be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana demand the regular order?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not.

Mr. LOVERING. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi will withdraw his objection, as this asks for but a day or a part of a day.

Mr. SINGLETON. I will withdraw the objection.

There being no further objection, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. LOVERING moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. This requires a two-thirds vote.

The question was taken; and the Speaker decided that by the sound the ayes seemed to prevail.

Mr. MORRILL. I demand a division.

The House divided.

Before the announcement of the result,

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw the demand for a division.

So (no further count being demanded) the motion to dispense with the morning hour was agreed to—two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. COOK. I rise to a question of the highest privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOK. I desire to call up the contested-election case of Chalmers vs. Manning.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I hope my friend from Iowa will yield to me for a moment to ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution for reference.

Mr. COOK. I will yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. Several gentlemen have matters they desire to refer to committees, and if the gentleman from Iowa yields the Chair will recognize gentlemen for the presentation of such matters.

Mr. COOK. I will withdraw the demand temporarily.

JACOB PINDLE.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution for reference to the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House to Jacob Pindle $50 per month for service rendered in the bath-room of the House from the commencement and during the present session of Congress.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

REPORT OF BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I desire to offer a joint resolution for reference to the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 276) providing for the printing of 50,000 copies of the first annual report of the bureau of animal industry.

Be it enacted, &c., That there be printed 50,000 copies of the first annual report of the bureau of animal industry of the Department of Agriculture; of which 10,000 shall be for the use of members of the Senate, 35,000 for the use of members of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 for the use of the Commissioner of Agriculture. The illustrations to be executed under the supervision of the Public Printer in accordance with the direction of Joint Committee on Printing; the work to be subject to the approval of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL LABORERS UNDER THE DOORKEEPER.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I desire to submit a resolution for reference.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized to employ four additional laborers during the recess, namely, from the adjournment of this session to the 1st of December, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $720 per annum while employed.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

NATIONAL BANK OF HILLSBOROUGH, OHIO.

Mr. HART, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7428) to authorize the Hillsborough National Bank to change its name to that of the First National Bank of Hillsborough, Ohio; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BEACH. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk for reference to the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That during the remainder of this session of Congress it shall be in order, immediately after the approval of the Journal, to proceed in the House as in Committee of the Whole to the consideration, for the period of one hour, of bills and resolutions which shall have been previously reported by committees of the House and such reports printed, and Senate bills and resolutions on the Speaker's table which, or substantially similar measures, shall have received favorable action of appropriate House committees, in the following manner, to wit:

The Speaker shall call the committees in their order, whereupon, by direction of committees so called, not more than one measure may be called up for final consideration, which measure may or may not belong to the committee making the direction, as the case may be. If not more than five members object, such consideration shall proceed, provided that debate on each bill or resolution shall be limited to ten minutes, exclusive of five minutes which may be occupied in reading reports of committees or explanations in lieu thereof, this hour not to interfere with revenue or appropriation bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana object to the reference of the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do. I do not think the time has yet come for the adoption of the Pound rule.

Mr. COX, of New York. Let the resolution be referred.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana objects, and calls for the regular order.

COMPILATION OF INTERNAL-REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. SCALES, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means take into consideration the propriety of procuring and printing a compilation of internal-revenue legislation from the foundation of the Government under the Constitution to the present time, including a sketch of the debates leading to the passage of the several acts.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate insisted on its amendments to the bill (H. R. 3961) to grant to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BROWN, Mr. SAWYER, and Mr. HAWLEY as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments to the joint resolution (H. Res. 251) providing for the printing of the annual report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1884, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. GORMAN, and Mr. CONGER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF AGRICULTURE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as one of the managers on the part of the House of the conference between the two Houses on the joint resolution (H. Res. 251) providing for the printing of the annual report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1884, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, in place of Mr. ROGERS, of New York, who is absent from the city.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS, ETC.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. 7429) to modify existing laws relating to duties on imports and the collection of revenue; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

BRANCH HOME FOR DISABLED SOLDIERS.

Mr. LAIRD. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask unanimous consent to present a report.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for, which is the unfinished business coming over from last evening, on which the previous question was ordered. The Clerk will report the title of the bill:

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4696) to authorize the location of a branch home for disabled volunteer soldiers in either the State of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the passage of the bill. The previous question was ordered by the House.

The bill was passed.

Mr. LAIRD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HORSE-RAILWAY ON ROCK ISLAND.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the next bill coming over from last evening as unfinished business.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 445) to empower the Secretary of War to establish under certain conditions a horse-railway upon and over the island of Rock Island, and the bridges erected by the United States connecting the cities of Davenport and Rock Island therewith.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the passage of this bill, upon which the previous question has been ordered by the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read.

Mr. BLAND. I understand that this bill——

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. PRICE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLAND. I hope that may be done. I do not see why the Government should go to the expense of building a horse-railway for a private corporation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] moves to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 73, noes 58.

Tellers were ordered, 40 members voting therefor—more than one-fifth of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. PRICE, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. NEECE.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 49, noes 102.

So (further count not being called for) the motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed to the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the title so as to read:

"A bill to empower the Secretary of War to permit the establishment under certain conditions of a horse-railway upon and over the island of Rock Island, and the bridges erected by the United States connecting the cities of Davenport and Rock Island therewith."

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

Mr. ROSECRANS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I ask unanimous consent to have corrected a mistake made by my clerk in preparing the resolution which was adopted yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to offer for present consideration the resolution which he sends to the desk, stating that there was a mistake in the preparation of the resolution offered yesterday.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House shall take a recess this evening at 5 o'clock to reassemble at 8 o'clock, for the sole purpose of considering bills from the Committee on Military Affairs and Senate bills on the Speaker's table the subject-matter of which has been considered in the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I must object to that order being made at this late hour of the session.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COOK. I now call up for consideration the contested-election case of Chalmers vs. Manning.

Mr. MILLS. I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution reported by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That James R. Chalmers was duly elected as a Representative in the Forty-eighth Congress from the second district of Mississippi, and is entitled to be sworn in as a member of this House.

Mr. LEWIS. I raise the question of consideration against this case, in behalf of bills reported from the Committee on the Public Lands to forfeit land grants to railroads.

The SPEAKER. The question of consideration stands alone; it is not necessary to raise it in behalf of any particular proposition.

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House now proceed to the consideration of the contested-election case of Chalmers vs. Manning from the State of Mississippi?

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 112, nays 107, not voting 104; as follows:

So the House determined to proceed to the consideration of the election case.

The following were announced as paired on all questions until further notice:

Mr. LORE with Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina, with Mr. BAYNE.

Mr. BLACKBURN with Mr. RUSSELL.

The following were announced as paired on all political questions until further notice:

Mr. SNYDER with Mr. BARR.

Mr. HILL with Mr. HOLTON.

Mr. MORSE with Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois.

Mr. REAGAN with Mr. OCHILTREE.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina, with Mr. LACEY.

Mr. DAVIDSON with Mr. HAYNES.

Mr. BUCKNER with Mr. KELLOGG.

Mr. GREEN with Mr. THOMAS.

Mr. LE FEVRE with Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio.

Mr. MATSON with Mr. LIBBEY.

Mr. CLARDY with Mr. J. S. WISE.

Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. CHACE.

Mr. MORGAN with Mr. CULLEN.

Mr. YOUNG with Mr. PAYNE.

Mr. HUTCHINS with Mr. CALKINS.

The following were also announced as paired:

Mr. GARRISON with Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania, on this vote.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama, with Mr. BURLEIGH, until June 25.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, with Mr. KETCHAM, until June 30.

Mr. LAMB with Mr. LONG, until June 28.

Mr. GRAVES with Mr. MORRILL, until June 26.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York, with Mr. BREITUNG, until June 25.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, with Mr. PETTIBONE, until June 27.

Mr. SKINNER, of North Carolina, with Mr. PERKINS, until June 27.

Mr. WILKINS with Mr. KASSON, until June 27.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I desire to record my vote, and ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not entertain a request for unanimous consent unless the gentleman states that he was in his seat when the roll was called and did not hear his name.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION CONTEST—CHALMERS VS. MANNING.

The SPEAKER. The House having determined to proceed with the consideration of the contested-election case from the second district of Mississippi, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COOK] is entitled to the floor. Does the gentleman desire to have the report read?

Mr. COOK. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. COSGROVE. I think the report had better be read.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Has not a member the right to call for the reading of the report?

The SPEAKER. Any gentleman has the right to have the report read in his own time, if he so desires; but otherwise the reading of the report can not be called for as a matter of right.

The resolution reported by the majority of the Committee on Elections was read, as follows:

Resolved, That James R. Chalmers was duly elected as a Representative in the Forty-eighth Congress from the second district of Mississippi, and is entitled to be sworn in as a member of this House.

Mr. COOK. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to a statement of the facts in this case, I wish to say that the report made to the House has been delayed because, when the committee decided the matter, the work of making the report was assigned to the gentleman from Ohio

[Mr. CONVERSE]. Some time afterward he announced his inability to make the report, owing to indisposition. I was then charged with the duty of making the report. I prepared it hastily in accordance with the conclusions of fact as arrived at by a majority of the sub-committee (of which I was a member) by which the case was heard. I stated at the time I presented the report that there would be gentlemen on the one side of the House who would think the report stated the facts too strongly to the prejudice of Mr. Chalmers, while on the other side there would be gentlemen who would claim that I had not stated them strong enough; but that the main issue would be upon the question of law presented in the report as to the eligibility of Mr. Chalmers.

All the Republican members of the committee, six in number, have presented their views, in which they strongly antagonize the conclusions of fact presented in the report of the majority.

There is one thing in the report which in justice to myself, to the committee, and to Mr. Chalmers I feel called upon to refer to in the outset. As I said before, the report was prepared by me in haste. It is unusually short. I designed simply to present the conclusions of the majority of the committee without any effort to state the evidence. My attention having been called to one portion of the report since it has been in print—and every gentleman will readily recognize that a matter when coldly viewed in print sometimes looks different from what it did when considered hastily in manuscript—I find that on the second page of the report one word is there by inadvertence. Where the words are "a large part of the evidence is calculated to show," the word "calculated" should have been "intended." It was not my purpose to present any view of the committee upon the matter stated in that paragraph, but simply to state that a large portion of the evidence in the case was intended to show a certain thing. It appears clearly, however, in the report that I simply refer to the matter to show that it was immaterial in the case.

Mr. RANNEY. "Intended" by whom—by the parties giving the evidence or the party introducing it?

Mr. COOK. I meant to say that it was intended by the party who introduced it—the contestee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the fact is there is in the evidence a great deal that is wholly immaterial to the question, to which this House must limit itself under its duty of judging of the election of Mr. Chalmers, because it will be observed from the report that the matter of the election of Mr. Manning is entirely disregarded. No one can seriously claim under the testimony that Mr. Manning has any claim whatever to the seat upon the merits of the case. Mr. Chalmers received a majority of over 1,100 in the district. The facts attempted to be proved by Mr. Manning would not show that he had any right to the seat. They could not do more than make the election void.

The only question before the House is whether Mr. Chalmers has the right to be sworn in. While referring to this question I want to say again that this House has no right to look into the political antecedents of either of these men. And what I had reference to in that part of the report is simply matter pertaining to Mr. Chalmers's political methods. I urge the House to pay no attention to Mr. Chalmers's political history, methods, or motives, as all this does not bear on the question of who was elected.

There is another branch which is properly before the House, and that is matters charged in reference to the conduct of the election and the canvass leading thereto, upon which it is claimed the election should be set aside as fraudulent.

Gentlemen who look at the report submitted by me in behalf of the majority of the committee should not take one fact or one conclusion stated separately from the other; all the conclusions of fact should be fairly taken together.

There is one conclusion I wish to call attention to now, which is that all the facts the majority of the committee find to be true fail to show that Mr. Chalmers is indebted in his election to those facts. In short, noman can fairly say, "I think if nothing of this had occurred Chalmers would not have been fairly elected." On the contrary, on my own responsibility I wish to say here—and I believe the gentlemen who were with me on the subcommittee and who alone looked into the facts of the case are with me in the conclusion—that if Mr. Chalmers had announced himself as a candidate in that district under all the circumstances which surrounded him, bearing in mind he had formerly resided there and was well acquainted in the district, without any interference of the Federal authorities in the canvass or at the election he would have been elected. That is the conclusion the committee arrived at, and I believe we fairly considered the facts in the case and matters of general public notoriety which may be called historical facts and which we had a right to consider.

I wish to say right here as a matter of law this House must not overlook this fact that no matter what was done that was contrary to public policy, or even that was a fraud on the election, before you can set aside the election of a man who received a majority you must find those facts produced the results and that the majority he received was gained by such methods. It is a familiar rule of law in the courts in all matters when what is done is contrary to public policy, unless it is shown affirmatively the result is reached through that, and by means of it, the result can not be disturbed.

Again, the principal objection is that Chalmers called upon certain members of the Departments here in Washington for aid, or that he consulted them with regard to the canvass; that the canvass was directed by them, and he had the aid of the Federal officials in his district in making his canvass and securing his election.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the proof in regard to that shows that it was mainly devoted to securing him the support of the Republican party. He was nominated by the Republican party of his district, and that influence was mainly to secure him that nomination.

Now, grant it that he secured that through the influence of the Federal officials; that is wholly immaterial to the question before the House. We certainly can not commit ourselves to the idea that a man's right to a seat on this floor shall be antagonized because he secured the nomination of a political party, no matter by what method. If these officials aided him in securing the Republican nomination and the support of the Republican organization in that district it will not be claimed on that ground he should be denied his seat on the floor of the House to which a majority of the people elected him.

I want now to address myself to the legal question which arises in the case.

Mr. WOLFORD. I understand you to say that by fraud and violence he was given the nomination so to speak. Am I correct?

Mr. COOK. The gentleman misunderstood me. I did not say fraud and violence were resorted to.

Mr. WOLFORD. Was not fraud or violence used in securing him that nomination?

Mr. COOK. I know of none. There was no fraud so far as I know in securing him the Republican nomination in his district. There is nothing to show he paid any delegates to the convention, and I do not think even if he had purchased that nomination we could on that account set aside his election.

Now, if I am not interrupted, before I go to the legal question involved I want to say here that no man upon this floor will go further than I would to set aside an election or declare it void because of interference by Federal officials or the use or promise of Federal patronage. I looked into this case from that standpoint and I failed to find sufficient to warrant me here to say the election should be set aside. And that I may not be misunderstood, I will at the risk of repetition say although every fact stated in the report of the majority by me submitted is true and much occurred in the canvass and at the election that every good citizen must condemn, yet before we can set aside the election we must find as a principal fact that the election resulted from this conduct or these acts, and in view of the large majority Chalmers received and the previous history of the district we are not warranted in saying that his election was brought about by these means.

There is another question, a question of law, involved, to which I will now give attention. It is claimed that Mr. Chalmers is not entitled to be sworn in or to hold his seat here because of the fact that on the 9th of December, 1882, he was by the Attorney-General of the United States employed or appointed as a "special assistant to the district attorney for the northern and southern districts of Mississippi," which he retained until after Congress convened, or at least that he filled the office or exercised the duties, whatever they were, conferred by this appointment after the 4th of March and after the term of office to which he was elected had begun.

Now, the first question upon that point is whether this is an office under the Constitution that declares no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office. The majority of the committee agree that it is not such an office as the Constitution contemplates. Still others of the committee came to the conclusion that, whether it be an office or not, Mr. Chalmers surrendered the office or did not exercise its functions after the time for the convening of the House by law; that is to say, after the first Monday in December.

I take the view that a man holding an incompatible office may, under the decisions of the House, exercise its functions after the term for which he is elected begins; but if he surrenders it or it expires before the time for the convening of the House he is not disqualified from being sworn in as a member. In short, that he may hold the two offices until the time of the convening of the House.

In support of that proposition we have the case of Earle, cited in Clark & Hall, 314; and also the case of Schenck, directly in point.

There is still another matter. It is claimed that Mr. Chalmers never formally resigned the position until after the House actually convened.

The facts, however, are, as the majority of the committee find them, that he was appointed for a special purpose, to aid the district attorney in the prosecution of some election cases; that he rendered his account to the Department before the first Monday in December, and that his account was closed and his connection with the Department ceased before that time; that no resignation was necessary, and that he therefore stands from that time the same as if he had resigned his office. Directly in point on this proposition is Mr. Munford's case, where it was held by the House that the formal resignation of an office held by a member-elect is not necessary; that the duties of the office having ceased operates a virtual abolition of the office. That, I say, is directly in point on this proposition, and therefore if his connection with the office had ceased it was immaterial whether he resigned or not.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one thing further and then I shall yield the floor. The Committee on Elections has sometimes been criticised because of the delay in deciding these cases. I want here, because it is the only opportunity I will have, to call the attention of the House to a fact not specially connected with this contest, but with contests generally. The law relating to the taking of testimony and the preparation of these cases for a decision by the committee, under the rules of the House pertaining to its organization, is so defective that the Committee on Elections can not enter upon the work of deciding these cases until the expiration of three months after the House has organized; and then we go to work upon a record so voluminous and a mass of printed matter so large that it is impossible to do contestants justice in time.

I can appreciate the wrong done to contestants by this delay when I think of my own case in the last Congress, which was not decided until twenty-three hours before the term expired. The present committee, I believe, has worked harder than any other committee. It has met in general sessions every other day and its subcommittees have met and worked in the interim. The cases we have disposed of cover over 12,000 pages of closely printed matter.

Something should be done by the way of an enactment to change the law that is now upon the statute-books to the end that the evidence should be printed in vacation, as also the briefs of counsel, so that when the House has organized the Committee on Elections may at once set to work upon the examination of the cases before them. It is very important that this Congress should not neglect the passage of such an enactment.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ELLIS in the chair). The gentleman has thirty-five minutes remaining.

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, two questions are presented in this case:

1. Is the position of Representative an office?

2. Is that of special assistant United States district attorney an office?

In 1882 Mr. Manning and Mr. Chalmers were opposing candidates for Congress in the second Congressional district of Mississippi, and at the election in November of that year, Mr. Chalmers received the majority of the votes cast; and hence was entitled to the certificate of election and to a seat in this House at the assembling of this Congress, provided no disqualification existed at that time.

It will be remembered that on the 9th day of December, 1882, Mr. Chalmers was appointed by the Attorney-General special assistant United States district attorney. The first question then, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COOK] has stated, is whether this is an office in the meaning of the statute. I ask the Clerk to read sections 363 and 366 of the Revised Statutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 363. The Attorney-General shall, whenever in his opinion the public interest requires it, employ and retain, in the name of the United States, such attorneys and counselors at law as he may think necessary to assist the district attorneys in the discharge of their duties, and shall stipulate with such assistant attorneys and counsel the amount of compensation, and shall have supervision of their conduct and proceedings.

SEC. 366. Every attorney or counselor who is specially retained, under the authority of the Department of Justice, to assist in the trial of any case in which the Government is interested, shall receive a commission from the head of such Department, as a special assistant to the Attorney-General, or to some one of the district attorneys, as the nature of the appointment may require; and shall take the oath required by law to be taken by the district attorneys, and shall be subject to all the liabilities imposed upon them by law.

We gather from these two sections—

1. That the Attorney-General has the power to employ attorneys to assist the United States district attorneys.

2. That the Attorney-General has supervision of the conduct and proceedings of such assistants.

3. That the attorneys employed in the trial of any case in which the Government is interested shall receive a commission from the Attorney-General.

4. That they shall take the oath required by law to be taken by district attorneys.

5. And shall be subject to all liabilities imposed on district attorneys by law.

In a word, the assistants shall be commissioned, shall take the same oath, and perform the same duties required of district attorneys, and shall be subject to the same liabilities. They occupy the same position.

Mr. Chalmers was commissioned:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, December 9, 1882.

SIR: You are hereby appointed special United States assistant attorney for the northern and southern districts of Mississippi, to assist United States attorneys in the prosecution of violations of the election laws at the late election. Your compensation will be $500 at least and will not exceed $1,000, to be fixed at the discretion of the Attorney-General.

Very respectfully,

BREWSTER, Attorney-General.

Gen. J. R. CHALMERS,
419 New Jersey Avenue, S. E., Washington, D. C.

Mr. Chalmers took the oath of office:

I, James R. Chalmers, of Mississippi, do solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter: so help me God.

JAMES R. CHALMERS.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 12th day of December, A. D. 1882.
[L. S.] WILL HAIGHT, Notary Public.

Clearly, then, Mr. Chalmers accepted an office under the United States and subsequent to his election as Representative. But it is held that the statute uses the words "employ" and "retain," and these imply simply a contract.

Section 169 of Revised Statutes provides "each head of a Department is authorized to employ in his Department such number of clerks of the several classes recognized by law."

By subsequent sections the duties of clerks are to be regulated by the several Departments.

It will hardly be maintained that a special assistant district attorney is not an officer if these clerks are officers of the United States Government. Whatever may be the duties and liabilities of the district attorney become by section 366 the duties of his assistant. They are therefore in the strictest sense regulated by law. There is a position provided for by law, and the duties appertaining thereto are prescribed by law. The person who fills it must therefore be an officer of the Government that made the place and prescribed its duties.

While the same word "employ" is used in reference to clerks and assistant district attorneys, the duties of the former are to be regulated by the several Departments, and those of the latter are regulated by fixed laws. Clerks are recognized everywhere as officers of the United States, and courts have held them to be such officers.

Ex parte William S. Smith, 2 Cranch, Circuit Court Reports, page 693. This was a case of habeas corpus sued out by Smith, alleging he was illegally held in custody by the marshal of the District of Columbia. The marshal in his return said the cause of detention "to be for sundry militia fines, &c., * * * put into the hands of said marshal for collection according to law."

The second section of the act organizing the militia exempted from militia duty "the Vice-President of United States, the officers, judicial and executive, of the Government of the United States."

Smith was a clerk in the Treasury Department, and as such claimed he was exempt from militia duty under said section, and therefore not liable for the fine for the non-payment of which he was in custody. The court decided that Smith was an executive officer of the Government of the United States and was not liable to be enrolled in the militia.

There are several other authorities, but it is useless to multiply them. It is also claimed that Mr. Chalmers was employed for particular cases and a temporary purpose. That can make no difference, for section 366 uses the words "in any case." So neither duration nor the extent of his employment could change his relation to the Government.

It is also claimed that if this was an office, it ceased before Congress convened; in other words, that when Mr. Chalmers presented an account for $500 and it was paid his services in that position ceased. The letter of the Attorney-General is referred to as corroborative of this claim, in which letter he says he regarded the payment of the account as ending Mr. Chalmers's employment, and no resignation was necessary. But it must not be forgotten that only a few days before this the Attorney-General wrote that "Mr. Chalmers is still in its employment" (the Government's).

But his opinion can not change the law and the facts. His opinion can not vacate an office. There are but three ways by which an office can be vacated. One is by removal, another by resignation, and the third by its expiration. Was Mr. Chalmers removed from this office? No. Had its term expired? No limit was fixed in the commission, and some of the election cases were still pending. Did he resign? Yes; but not until February 26, 1884, two months after this Congress assembled, and even then he resigned only for the northern and not for the southern district of Mississippi. He was appointed for both; and occupies to-day the position of special assistant United States district attorney for the southern district, an office under the United States, and hence is ineligible to a seat in this House.

I know the authorities are to the effect that a member may hold an office under the United States up to the time Congress assembles. The reason given is that the Constitution simply says "no person holding an office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office," and that he can not be a member until Congress assembles and he takes the oath of office.

This construction of this clause of the Constitution strikes me as obnoxious to common sense and reason. Why? Because is is claimed the intention of this clause is to prevent executive interference with the deliberations and legislation of Congress; and yet this intepretation will permit a member-elect to hold a United States office up to the very hour he takes the oath of office as a member of this House. It would, it seems to me, be difficult to determine when the executive influence ceases, the hour before taking or the hour after taking the oath required of members of this House.

Those who hold to this view attach to the word "member" a significance it does not possess, making a wide distinction between the Representative before taking the oath and the Representative after taking the oath.

"The oath of office, as the supreme court of North Carolina decides, is a mere incident and constitutes no part of the office."

Section 2, article 1, of the Constitution says:

The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year, &c.

Section 3, of same article, says:

No person shall be a Representative, &c.

What is meant here? Evidently that the House of Representatives shall be composed of Representatives or members chosen every second year, the words "Representatives" and "members" being used as synonymous terms. The word "members" is simply used to prevent the repetition of the word "Representatives." The Representatives constitute the House.

So in the third clause of section 6:

And no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office. The word "member" is simply used to avoid the repetition of the words "Senator or Representative."

The words "Representative" and "member" being used as synonymous terms in the Constitution, and an oath being no part of an office, the question, "Is a Representative an officer?" presents itself.

The power to choose Representatives is lodged in the people of the States. As soon as the choice is made the Constitution is complied with in this particular and a Representative becomes an officer. There is but one thing left for him to do, and that is to take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution does not say where or when he shall take it, but simply that "Senators and Representatives shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support the Constitution of the United States." (Article 6, clause 1.) This very clause, it will be noticed, recognizes them as Senators and Representatives before they are bound by oath or affirmation, thereby clearly indicating that the oath is no part of the office. That of Representative being an office, we need not go to the Constitution to determine this question.

Willcok, in his Treatise upon Municipal Corporations, states that "the election of an officer to an incompatible office does not vacate the former before acceptance by the officer." Angell and Ames on Corporations adopt this same language. In Whitney vs. Canique (2 Hill, 93) this language is used:

The appointment of a person to a second office incompatible with the first is not absolutely void, but on his subsequently accepting the appointment and qualifying the first office is ipso facto vacated.

Mr. Chalmers was elected a Representative to this Congress at the November election 1882. He signified his acceptance of that position, or, to use the language of Cushing, "he did what was incumbent on him to qualify him to discharge the duties of the office of Representative." His case can not be distinguished in principle from that of a party duly elected and presented with a commission.

As I have said, after this election Mr. Chalmers accepted the office of special assistant United States district attorney in 1883. Are these two offices incompatible? Certainly. One makes him subject to the supervision and orders of the executive department of the Government; the other to the control and authority of the House of Representatives. He can not serve these two masters at once. So it makes no difference if he resigned, or his service ended, as special assistant United States district attorney, before this Congress assembled. The acceptance of the office of special assistant United States district attorney while he was a Representative vacated the office of Representative. This is in accord with the spirit and true intent and meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the majority report be read as a part of my remarks.

The Clerk read the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections (presented by Mr. COOK), as follows:

At the regular election for Representative in this Congress, in the second district of Mississippi, James R. Chalmers received a majority of the votes cast.

The certificate of election or commission, however, was given to the contestee, Van H. Manning. The facts and circumstances under which this was done fully appear in the report and proceedings on the question of prima facie right heretofore had.

In the contest on the merits Mr. Manning took the burden of the issue and sought to show that there was such interference in the election and canvass leading to it by the Executive Departments at Washington and Federal authorities in the district as to at least make the election void.

It appears that Mr. Chalmers, a short time before the election, was declared not elected to a seat which he occupied as a Democrat in the Forty-seventh Congress. Up to this time he had for years acted with the Democrats. Immediately after this he conferred with leading Republicans at Washington and with members of the administration, arranging with them to aid him in securing the support of the Republicans of this district, in which he did not then reside. It is fairly proved that he had the active aid of the Departments at Washington and their subordinates in the district in the work of securing the support of the Republican party organization in his canvass, and the votes of its adherents, the great mass of whom are of the colored race.

While the evidence is not clear, yet it fairly shows facts that are a reproach to the civil service of the country.

Not only was much time for which some of the Federal officials were paid by the Government devoted to canvassing for the contestant, but their accounts for expenses incurred in the canvass were rendered to the Departments at Washington as incurred on account of the Government, although it does not appear that they were paid.

The committee appreciate the gravity of the issue thus presented; elections should be free from all corrupting influences.

The use of large sums of money in elections in many parts of the country is an element of danger, even though it be not used directly upon the voters.

That the Federal patronage and the influence of superiors may produce a strong and corrupting effect among a voting population such as this district contains must be admitted. The direct bribery of voters and corrupt use of money could not be much more baneful.

Again, it is of the highest importance that Congress should be a body free as far as may be from executive interference or dominance. No member should feel that he is in any degree indebted to the Executive Departments for the seat which he holds.

The use of the executive patronage and power is a growing evil, the force and effect of which all good citizens realize only to regret and condemn; nor can we close our eyes to the fact that this influence may be exercised with greater effect and more perniciously in one section of the country than another.

Believing that it is the duty of the House, whenever it is shown that the election of a member is the result of this influence, to declare the election void; and believing, further, that the testimony in a case is to be taken in connection with contemporaneous historical facts, your committee has given careful attention to the record and evidence in this case. We conclude that it can not fairly be said that the election of Mr. Chalmers was secured by such undue influence; that is to say, that without it he would not have been elected, especially in view of the large majority he received. It was perhaps more instrumental in making him the candidate of the Republican party and suppressing other aspirants for party support. But with this we think the House has no concern.

A large part of the evidence is intended to show that the contestant was deceitful in his politics, treacherous to his political friends, and unworthy of so high an office. This, however, must address itself to the voters of his district, and the House has no right to render an unjust decision, because a man lawfully elected may be subject to this criticism more or less.

It is next claimed that Mr. Chalmers, if legally elected, has since his election disqualified himself from holding this office by accepting another office from the United States and performing its duties within the term of office of a member of the Forty-eighth Congress, under the following provision of the Constitution, "And no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office," because on the 9th day of December, 1882, Mr. Chalmers was by the Attorney-General of the United States employed or appointed "special assistant to the district attorneys for the northern and southern districts of Mississippi," and that by retaining this position he had vacated his office as Representative.

Your committee, however, passing the question of whether this is an office within the meaning of the Constitution, find that Mr. Chalmers was retained for a special purpose, and that prior to the time for the convening of Congress the matter for which he was appointed or employed had been disposed of. His account had been rendered to and closed by the Department. No resignation had been made; none was necessary. Practically, his connection with the office of district attorney had ceased.

We recommend to the House for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That James R. Chalmers was duly elected as a Representative in the Forty-eighth Congress from the second district of Mississippi, and is entitled to be sworn in as a member of this House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. JOHNSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had adopted a resolution of the House to print 9,000 copies of the report of the Director of the Mint on the production of the precious metals in the United States for the year 1883.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 1682) providing for two additional associate justices to the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota; and

A bill (H. R. 5667) granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes.

ELECTION CONTEST—CHALMERS VS. MANNING.

The House resumed the consideration of the contested-election case of Chalmers vs. Manning from the second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Considering the action which I thought proper to take upon this case in its primary stage, I think I can hardly be accused of partiality toward the contestant. I believed that the contestee, or Mr. Manning, should have been seated upon his prima facie case. After a most careful inquiry, a most thorough examination of the record, I am just as thoroughly of the opinion that Mr. Chalmers ought to be seated upon the merits.

This case is within a very narrow limit; there is but a single question upon which any controversy arises. It is conceded and must be conceded that Mr. Chalmers received more than 1,000 majority of the legal votes cast at that election. No man controverts the fact that he was duly elected.

It is claimed, and some evidence was introduced to show that he received contributions of money from the Republican national committee and from Republican officials in Washington. But there is not a scintilla of evidence in this record that shows or tends to show that a dollar of that money was used for the purpose of influencing a single voter in that district. It is impossible for me to conceive how gentlemen upon that committee who have examined carefully the record in this case can take the position upon this floor that Mr. Chalmers was not duly elected and ought not to be seated.

I submit that this House can not afford to refuse to seat a man, no matter what his politics, no matter what may be his political character, if his district has said, and by a large majority, "This man is he whom we desire to represent us in the House of Representatives."

The only point made against Mr. Chalmers is that subsequent to his election he accepted an office under the Government of the United States, which had the effect to vacate his office of member of Congress. Upon that question I desire to be heard a few moments. Subsequent to his election he was retained and employed by the Attorney-General of the United States to prosecute certain specific cases in certain districts of Mississippi in which the Government of the United States was interested.

Mr. RANNEY. Employed to aid the district attorney.

Mr. ELLIOTT. He was employed simply to aid the district attorney. The authority under which that employment was made is to be found in the following section of the Revised Statutes:

The Attorney-General shall, whenever in his opinion the public interests require it, employ and retain in the name of the United States such attorneys and counselors at law as he may think necessary to assist the district attorneys in the discharge of their duties.

In my judgment it requires a vivid imagination, and also requires a lawyer who reasons queerly, to take the position that an employment under that section constitutes an appointment to an office under the Government of the United States comprehended in the article of the Constitution which prohibits a member of Congress from being appointed to or holding any other office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States. Does not every lawyer understand, and most laymen who have had occasion to have lawsuits, what the retaining of a lawyer means? It means hiring him to try a lawsuit; that is what it means. Nobody ever thought that by retaining a lawyer he was appointed to an office within the meaning of the Constitution.

But it is not left to inference. This section says "shall employ and retain." Now, to employ does not mean to appoint to an office, any more than to retain a lawyer means to appoint him to fill an office. He is employed and retained for a special purpose.

And I desire to state here and now that the evidence from the Attorney-General's Office (and that was all the evidence that was before the committee) shows simply that Mr. Chalmers was employed to assist the district attorney in trying certain specific enumerated cases. He had no other functions to perform than to try the cases, or to assist in the trial of the cases which he contracted with the Attorney-General to try at the time he was employed. And when those cases were tried his relations to the Attorney-General and to the Government ceased. The Attorney-General certifies that he settled the accounts of Mr. Chalmers long before it was necessary for him to have been sworn in as a member of this House, had his seat not been contested.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to know whether in the payment of Mr. Chalmers he was paid under the statute providing the mode of paying district attorneys, or whether he was paid under a special contract.

Mr. ELLIOTT. He was paid under the provision of this section which I was about to read:

To assist the district attorneys in the discharge of their duties, and shall stipulate with such assistant attorney and counselor—

Not such assistant district attorney, but such attorney and counselor—shall stipulate with such assistant attorney and counselor the amount of compensation.

The contract in this case was that Mr. Chalmers should receive a retainer of $500; and the compensation for all services it was agreed should not exceed $1,000. He was paid $500, and the Attorney-General declined to pay him more; and that was prior to the time when Mr. Chalmers could have taken his seat in this House.

Now, I undertake to say that if he was an officer his term of office expired prior to the time when he could have taken his seat in this House; and if this House has ever determined one thing more strongly than another in election cases, it has determined that a member of Congress elect may hold and perform the duties of an office up to the time when it becomes his duty to be sworn in as a member. Hence there is not left a shadow for the opponents of Mr. Chalmers to stand up under the precedents of this House.

But, Mr. Speaker, examine further the phraseology employed in this section:

And retain in the name of the United States.

Who ever heard of such phraseology being employed when it was the purpose to appoint a man to office?

"To retain in the name." In other words the person thus employed is to act as agent of the plaintiff in such suits—to act in the name of his client—in the name of the United States. This is the duty of Mr. Chalmers or any other attorney or counselor at law who is employed to assist the district attorney in the trial of causes.

Now I undertake to say that the employment in this case has not the first element of an office. It is simply a contract relation between these two parties—the Attorney-General acting for the Government, as he is authorized to act, and Mr. Chalmers acting for himself.

Why, sir, if this had been an appointment to an office the party appointed would have no voice in determining his compensation or the duration of his employment or the time for which his office should continue. In this case the whole matter was a subject of contract, the contract being made under this act of Congress authorizing the employment.

I beg to call the attention of the House to an authority or two on this question, and I ask pardon for detaining the House, because in my judgment there can be no question in the minds of the lawyers of this House upon this subject. But it may be well perhaps to refresh our memories in reference to what has been held to be an office in this country. I call attention to Brockenborough's Reports, the opinion in the case having been given by Chief-Justice Marshall. He was a reasonably fair lawyer in his day, though his theories may now be exploded.

The question in this case was whether the superintendent of fortifications was an officer. A suit upon the bond of this superintendent was brought, and it was held that he was not an officer because his employment did not come from the head of a Department. But the court held that his bondsmen were liable at common law for the faithful performance of the duties which he undertook to perform for the Government of the United States. In the course of his opinion Judge Marshall states the doctrine as to what constitutes an office; and the opinion of Judge Marshall in this case has been since followed in the courts of the United States and the courts of the different States of this Union. Judge Marshall says:

Although an office is "an employment," it does not follow that every employment is an office. A man may certainly be employed under a contract, express or implied, to do an act, or perform a service, without becoming an officer. But if a duty be a continuing one—

Mark the language—"if a duty be a continuing one." Was this employment a continuing one? Had it duration? Were the duties prescribed by law?—

But if a duty be a continuing one, which is defined by rules prescribed by the Government—

And if rules are prescribed by the Government they must be prescribed by statute, or there must be a statute authorizing the establishment of rules by some Department of the Government—

But if a duty be a continuing one which is defined by rules prescribed by the Government, and not by contract, which an individual is appointed by Government to perform, who enters on the duties appertaining to his station without any contract defining them—

Was there any contract in this case defining the relations between the Attorney-General and Mr. Chalmers?—

without any contract defining them, if those duties continue, though the person be changed——

Now, I desire the House to examine this case in the light of the statement of Judge Marshall. Had this office duration? There was a contract that Mr. Chalmers should try those causes. That is all the contract he had. Would the office have continued upon the death of Mr. Chalmers? For what length of time would it have continued? If this man was an officer there must have been an office to be filled; and if there was an office to be filled, it continued after Mr. Chalmers ceased to be an officer.

Was there any office left after Chalmers concluded his duties? No man will pretend for a moment there was a continuing office; that his duties were continuous; that his duties were prescribed by statutes; that he had any of the functions of district attorney except to sit down by the side of the district attorney and try causes he was employed to try by the Attorney-General.

I have a recent case determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, which, in my judgment, is on all fours with this case. I call the attention of the House, in 99 United States Reports, to the case commencing on page 508, United States vs. Germaine. This case came into the Supreme Court through a difference of opinion between the district and circuit judges. The defendant was appointed by the Commissioner of Pensions to act as surgeon under the act of March 3, 1873, the third section of which is thus stated in the Revised Statutes:

That the Commissioner of Pensions be, and is hereby, empowered to appoint, at his discretion—

Here the word "appoint" is used—civil surgeons to make a periodical examination of pensioners which are, or may be, required by law, and to examine applicants for pension.

He was indicted for extortion in the State of Maine, for collecting fees from men to which he was not entitled, under the section which authorizes the prosecution of officers of the United States for taking extortionate fees. The Supreme Court held he was not an officer because he was not appointed by the President or head of Department under the Constitution:

United States vs. Hartwell is not, as supposed, in conflict with these views. It is clearly stated and relied on in the opinion that Hartwell's appointment was approved by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury as acting head of that Department, and he was therefore an officer of the United States.

If we look to the nature of the defendant's employment, we think it equally clear that he is not an officer. In that case the court said the term embraces the ideas of tenure, duration, emolument, and duties, and that the latter were continuing and permanent, not occasional or temporary.

Now, sir, were the duties in this case continuing and permanent or occasional and temporary?

In the case before us the duties are not continuing and permanent, and they are occasional and intermittent. The surgeon is only to act when called on by the Commissioner of Pensions in some special case, as when some pensioner or claimant of a pension presents himself for examination.

In this case the act of Congress authorized the appointment, not the employment, and yet the Supreme Court say that the examining surgeon is not an officer of the Government of the United States, because his duties are not continuing, because they are not permanent in their character; they are occasional and temporary.

It seems to me I have got my view before the House, and that is all I desire. My purpose is not to take the time of the House, but to call attention to the fact that the statute under which this man is claimed to be an officer authorized the employment, authorized the retaining, authorized the retaining in the name of the United States, and does not authorize the appointment of an assistant district attorney. It is claimed in the minority report, as I understand, that he was appointed assistant district attorney. He was appointed to assist the district attorney—that is to say, to assist the district attorney in the trial of special cases.

I undertake to say there is no authority in the Supreme Court of the United States, there is not a single authority in the Government, for I have given this question some attention, that at all bears out the view entertained by the distinguished gentleman who made this minority report. It has been held in my State that district attorneys where they were formerly appointed by the attorney-general of the State instead of being elected in the several counties, were simply appointees and did not hold office within the meaning of the constitution of Pennsylvania. It has been held over and over again by the different States that employment of this character was simply the hiring of a lawyer to try a lawsuit, and when he performed that service his employment was at an end.

Another thing is conclusive to my mind on this question, that you can not separate the office from the man. In this case, if Mr. Chalmers was an officer he was also the office, for the office did not continue after he was settled with by the Attorney-General and discharged.

As this is the only question in this case, I submit this man should be promptly seated, and that no questions of a political consideration should enter into this discussion or should influence the House in its vote. Whether we like him or dislike him, whether we agree or disagree with him, he was fairly elected, against whose majority no evidence has been introduced, who has more than 1,000 majority, and was simply retained by the Government to try a specified case, and they say that is within the contemplation of the Constitution of the United States prohibiting a member of Congress holding any other office of profit or trust under the Government of the United States.

Do you suppose, sir, that the framers of that Constitution contemplated that the Attorney-General could not hire a member of this House to assist him in the preparation or trial of a cause without that member forfeiting his seat on this floor? If he forfeits it by virtue of the employment when he agrees to try ten cases, he forfeits it on the same principle by making an agreement to participate in the trial of one cause; and if the Attorney-General, who, as he did a few days ago, employed a citizen of my own State to come down here to Washington to assist in the prosecution of a single case, and that gentleman so employed had been a member of Congress, is it pretended that he would thereby have forfeited his seat here because forsooth he held an office within the contemplation of the Constitution of the United States? I think that position will hardly be maintained.

Mr. HUNT. May I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question before he sits down?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Certainly.

Mr. HUNT. Has the gentleman the terms of the employment embodied in the record in this case? And, if so, I ask him to be kind enough to inform the House what they are.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I will answer the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri. I can answer the question of the gentleman from Louisiana so far as the record is concerned. Here is the commission published in the report of the committee, and the correspondence in reference to it.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I thank the gentleman from Louisiana for his suggestion as to that point. The gentleman asks me as to what are the terms of the employment of Chalmers, and whether they appear by the record. I will say to him in answer that nothing of this kind appeared by the record as made up by the pleading, neither in the petition of the contestant nor in the answer or the testimony.

Later, while the case was under argument, it was contended that Mr. Chalmers had accepted another office, and correspondence with the Attorney-General's Office was introduced before the committee. That was all we had to act upon in that respect, and it appears by that correspondence simply that he was retained to try certain cases as an assistant counsel, and was paid therefor $500, and the Department refused to pay any more when a subsequent account was rendered. The Attorney-General said he considered his term of service as having expired and that there was no further need of any statement between the Government and himself.

Now, it has been said by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DAVIS] that there was a commission. I will state to the House what that commission was. It was simply a letter from the Attorney-General authorizing him to act, just as I would give my power of attorney to any man to act for me in a particular and given case. That is all. You call that an office, do you? Of course it was necessary that he should have had authority from the Attorney-General to act, and the gentleman from Missouri would have the letter from him read before he sat down. But it is said, and I desire to reply to that now, that he was required to take an oath before entering upon the duties assigned to him.

Mr. Speaker, every lawyer is required to take an oath, and the more times he swears ordinarily the better it is for his clients. But the taking of an oath does not constitute the man an officer within the terms and meaning of the Constitution of the United States. He ought to perform his duties confided to him as an attorney of this client; and that is what is required under this act of Congress.

But, sir, there is another and a subsequent section to which my friend from Missouri has called attention and which I had almost forgotten to allude to. I hold that the employment of Mr. Chalmers comes under the section to which I have called attention. There is, however, a subsequent section which provides for taking the oath and on which the majority rely:

Every attorney or counselor who is specially retained—

Now, does it do anything more? But to make this plain, this section upon which they rely, I will read the entire section—

Every attorney or counselor who is specially retained under the authority of the Department of Justice to assist in the trial of any case in which the Government is interested, shall receive a commission from the head of such Department, &c.

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri. Now read the commission itself.

Mr. ELLIOTT. You may read it in your own time. I have stated it, and any member of the committee who examined the question will bear me out in this assertion, that it is merely an authority given to act in this case. I do not care what phraseology the Attorney-General couched that letter in. He can not rise above the law. He might have given a commission to perform any and all duties. He might have put the seal of the Department of State upon it. He might have had it signed by every member of the Cabinet and by the President of the United States, but he could not have added a single iota to the authority given him by the act of Congress. I repeat I do not care what phraseology he employs; it is to my mind ridiculous to talk about the phraseology of a letter from the Attorney-General when his authority comes under the section to which I have called attention.

The idea is preposterous that he can by a commission make an officer when the law does not make the party he employs an officer of the Government. I should be glad to have some gentleman explain to this House how the Attorney-General can make a man an officer if there is not any authority of law to constitute him one. Does not the provision in the subsequent section providing for a commission construe itself? Is it from the President? Not at all. It is an authority from the Attorney-General to act, and it says he is "specially retained." Does not everybody understand what that means? "Specially retained." Does that mean appointment to an office? Has he continuing office under the meaning of the Constitution?

With these remarks I submit, so far as I am concerned, this question to the consideration of the House.

Mr. BENNETT rose.

Mr. COOK. I wish to inquire, before the gentleman from North Carolina proceeds, how long time is desired on that side?

Mr. BENNETT. I will say to my friend from Iowa that I have no idea at present of limiting myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ELLIS). The gentleman from North Carolina will proceed.

Mr. BENNETT. The election out of which this contest arose was held on the 7th day of November, 1882. On the 4th day of December, 1882, the notice of contest was served upon Mr. Manning by Mr. Chalmers. On the 20th day of December, 1882, the answer to Mr. Chalmers was filed in the cause. On the 9th day of December, 1882, Mr. Chalmers was appointed special assistant to the United States district attorneys for the northern and southern districts of Mississippi.

Here is the appointment:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., December 9, 1882.

SIR: You are hereby appointed special assistant United States attorney for the northern and southern districts of Mississippi, to assist United States attorneys in the prosecution of violations of the election laws at the late election. Your compensation will be $500, and will not exceed $1,000, to be fixed at the discretion of the Attorney-General.

Very respectfully,

BREWSTER, Attorney-General.

General J. R. CHALMERS,
419 New Jersey avenue, S. E., Washington, D. C.

The point is made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLIOTT] that this question of the eligibility of Mr. Chalmers was not made in any of the pleadings in the cause, but for the first time ground was broken respecting this ineligibility pending the hearing of this case before the Committee on Elections. How could it have been otherwise? The appointment of Mr. Chalmers to these places was made the 9th day of December, 1882. The notice of contest was served the 4th day of December, 1882. The answer was served on the 30th day of December, 1882. It was impossible, therefore, in the nature of things that this appointment should have been the subject of emphasis in the original pleadings in the cause.

Besides, I concede that a member of Congress, according to the precedents, may hold another office after his term of office begins and run that office along parallel with that of a member of this House or of a Senator at the other end of the Capitol until the first day of the session. Such seems to be the fair inference from Mumford's case, from Hammond's, and from Earle's. When the first Monday in December, the day for the assembling of the Congress, has come, then he makes his election, and if he holds another office after that date by operation of law it eviscerates the original one, so to speak, or at all events vacates the original one.

The true legal question, therefore, in this case is this—there is another, to which I purpose to devote myself by and by, turning upon the facts of this case—but the true legal question is whether on the first day of the session of this Congress, or at any time thereafter, Mr. Chalmers held another office than that which he claims to hold upon the floor of this House. The point could never have been made until the first Monday of December, 1883, that Mr. Chalmers held another office at variance with and in antagonism to that of membership upon this floor. How, then, could Mr. Manning have made the point in the pleadings? It could only have been made when the first Monday in December had come and gone. I apprehend no gentleman here who is capable of comprehending a legal principle will say that even in the absence of pleadings this House has no inherent power to purge itself of a member who attempts to hold and exercise upon this floor the office of Representative and who at the same time holds a position inconsistent therewith. The power of punishing for contempt is a power inherent to the constitution of courts of justice. The power of preserving order in the absence of all legislation, in the absence of any public rule, is a power inherent to the constitution of courts of justice. Shall it be said that this Congress, invested with power to legislate for a Government bounded on the south by bananas and on the north by icebergs, has no power to purge its body of an ineligible member unless the point is so denominated in the pleadings? Away with such nonsense! It is magnificent trifling.

Now, then, let us confront the legal proposition involved in this case. The appointment of Mr. Chalmers by the Department of Justice has been read. I do not propose to make any reflections against the head of that Department. I know him personally, and esteem him for his excellent qualities. I regard him as an honorable counselor, a good man and a just. The oath of Mr. Chalmers is as follows:

I, James R. Chalmers, of Mississippi, do solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God.

JAS. R. CHALMERS.

[SEAL.] WILL HAIGHT, Notary Public.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLIOTT] said a while ago that a man in the common lot of life when hiring a lawyer never for a moment suspected that the gentleman who was assuming that position toward him was an officer; that it was never assumed that an engagement between a client and an attorney reached so high a dignity. As the facts are put by the gentleman from Pennsylvania it is entirely obvious that the attorney is not a public officer in his relations to a private client.

There are a few significant differences between a special assistant to a United States district attorney and an ordinary lawyer, upon which I beg the kindly indulgence of this House while I comment. It is said by Forsyth, in his history of Hortensius, that part of the oath anciently taken by an attorney was that he would "bring nothing false before the court and would make war for his client." It is not supposed that it is the duty of one who is about to assume the relation of attorney to a client, whether he be hired or retained, to subscribe a fresh oath every time he repeats his engagement. I have no doubt that the member from Pennsylvania would find himself exceedingly crowded by the number of oaths to which he would have to subscribe if in every instance where a retainer came he had to appeal to the author of all human existence to witness the correctness of his conduct.

One thing is certain: the gentleman who assumes the attitude of special assistant to a United States district attorney takes an oath. Here it is, as filed in this case. Had he not before sworn "to bring nothing false before the court and to make war for his client?" What is there in the nature of things that so heightens the obligation that he owes to the Government when putting on these new robes that requires him to lay his hand upon his heart and again register his vow of fidelity to the country? Is there any inherent difference between a common client and the Government that makes it essentially necessary that an attorney assuming the relation of special assistant to the latter should again pledge himself afresh, should again declare that he will support the Constitution with all ardor, should again say, "This is my first love?" Is there any such inherent difference between the common virtuous citizen and the Government of the United States? I have the misfortune to have lived to this age and never have seen the difference between the sanctity of the two.

What, therefore, is the moving cause of this additional sacredness when he come to assume this relation to the General Government? Everybody is supposed to be loyal from one end of the country to the other. Why, therefore, take him again to the Book which is the best comfort of our imperfect condition and put him through the ordeal of swearing fidelity to the country and to his client? Not only an oath, but, as suggested to me by my friend from Missouri [Mr. DAVIS], an oath conceived partly in these words: "I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter." Is that a cunning juggle? Is that put in to make the condition completely splendid? Or does it mean something, and are they weighty words?

The people always think well when they think a long time. I have seen astute lawyers attempt to put the blinders on a jury of common people, and for the moment by their tempestuous eloquence they have swept them from their feet. But let that jury go out for a moment to perform some pressing personal necessity, and there will be somebody in it that will discover the true point in the case. You can not cover the central facts in this case and drive the true sense of this House away from its proper moorings.

It has been said here that if the engagement had expired by lapse of time or by non-user, or if the particular duty which the gentleman was appointed to perform had ended, then the engagement ends. Let it be so. Here is a communication from the Attorney-General, dated December 9, 1882:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, December 9, 1882.

SIR: As requested in your letter of the 4th instant, Hon. J. R. Chalmers has this day been appointed to assist in prosecuting the violators of the election laws at the last election in your State, and has been notified of his appointment at No. 419 New Jersey avenue, southeast, in this city.

Very respectfully,

BREWSTER, Attorney-General.

GREEN C. CHANDLER, Esq.,
United States Attorney, Oxford, Miss.

The election was held on the 7th of November and the appointment was made on the 9th of December. You have heard, Mr. Speaker, of feeding a dog on his own tail. [Laughter.] Here is another communication:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
February 21, 1884.

SIR: Please furnish me at your earliest convenience a copy of the order appointing Hon. J. R. Chalmers special assistant to the attorney of the United States for the northern and southern districts of Mississippi; of all accounts filed by said Chalmers for services indorsed as such, and copy of resignation filed by said Chalmers as such, with date of receipt of each at your Department. I desire copies of all the papers in connection with his appointment and service in your Department; and if there are others not specifically called for herein please furnish copies of the same.

Respectfully,

H. L. MULDROW,
Member Congress First District Mississippi.

Hon. BENJAMIN BREWSTER,
Attorney-General of the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, February 26, 1884.

SIR: As requested in your letter of the 21st instant, I have the honor to inclose a copy of the appointment of J. R. Chalmers, esq., a special assistant to the United States attorney for the districts of Mississippi.

Two accounts were presented by Mr. Chalmers. The first, for $500, was allowed, and a copy of it can be found at the Treasury Department. The second was disallowed entirely, as will be seen from a copy of a letter inclosed.

Mr. Chalmers is still in the employment of the Government. There is, therefore, no resignation on file from him.

Very respectfully,

BREWSTER, Attorney-General.

Hon. H. L. MULDROW,
House of Representatives.

I read these letters to show as a matter of fact that the engagement of Mr. Chalmers as special assistant to the United States district attorney has never ceased. I ask this House to underscore these letters and to fasten their attention upon them:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., February 26, 1884.

DEAR SIR: Mr. Manning has made the point on me that I am an office-holder under the United States by reason of my acceptance of employment from you to assist the United States district attorney for the northern district of Mississippi in the prosecution of the violators of the election laws.

I never considered myself thereby an officer of the United States; but if it is an office, I hereby resign all right or title I may have thereto.

I have the honor to be, yours, respectfully,

JAS. R. CHALMERS.

Hon. B. H. BREWSTER,
Attorney-General United States.

Now listen to this:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 5, 1884.

DEAR SIR: I have just seen your letter to Hon. H. L. MULDROW, of Mississippi, of February 26, stating that I was still in the employ of the Government because I had not resigned.

I respectfully call your attention to the terms of my employment and to your letter to me of 9th of July, 1883, in which you state that my compensation "was to be fixed by the Attorney-General on the conclusion of your services," and that you then and there fixed the amount at $500. I also respectfully call your attention to my letter of July 6 inclosing my account and asking a final settlement, because the court had quashed the information vs. E. M. Watson and others, and the United States district attorney had asked leave to dismiss the other cases. If my letter can be found please send me a copy of it.

I further respectfully ask whether Mr. Manning ever resigned a similar employment given to him during the time Hon. G. Wiley Wells was district attorney.

Yours, truly,

JAS. R. CHALMERS.

Hon. B. H. BREWSTER,
Attorney-General United States.

Here are the papers, gentlemen; take them and read them:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, February 26, 1884.

SIR: Your resignation as assistant to the United States attorney for Northern Mississippi, in the prosecution of violators of election laws, is accepted, to take effect this date.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Hon. J. R. CHALMERS,
House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, March 6, 1884.

SIR: Referring to my letter of the 26th ultimo, I desire to state that the information then furnished you in regard to Mr. Chalmers's resignation is erroneous to the extent that I then stated that Mr. Chalmers had not resigned, and was still an employé of the Government as an attorney to prosecute certain cases.

The records of the Department show but few formal resignations. The rendition of a final account and its payment is an official recognition of the resignation and its acceptance.

Very respectfully,

S. F. PHILLIPS, Acting Attorney-General.

Hon. H. L. MULDROW,
House of Representatives.

Mr. RANNEY. Will the gentleman state when that account was rendered?

Mr. BENNETT. Oh, yes. You always ask a question at the right place. You have a logical and chronological mind. [Laughter.] Now, listen just a moment:

The United States, Dr. to James R. Chalmers, assistant United States district attorney, for balance of services in the case of The United States vs. E. M. Watson et al. (Conspiracy to violate election laws.) 1942.

At the June term, 1883, of the western division of the northern district of Mississippi, at Oxford.

Balance due, case being ended, $500.

That case was tried on demurrer, and the indictment or information was quashed; and it is for services in that case alone that Mr. Chalmers filed his claim.

Personally appeared before me George R. Hill, clerk, &c., the undersigned, James R. Chalmers, who, being duly sworn, says that he rendered the services herein stated; that the account as stated is just and true, and that he has not received any payment therefor.

JAS. R. CHALMERS.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this the 6th day of July, 1883.

G. R. HILL,
Clerk United States Court.

It will be remembered that Mr. Chalmers was appointed special assistant to the district attorney for the northern and southern districts of Mississippi. This case—the only case in which he filed an account for services rendered—was in the northern district of Mississippi, and was a case against Watson and his codefendants.

Now, as to the southern district, I took the precaution to write to the Department of Justice for the entire correspondence covering this matter, and I apprehend that a great Department of this Government that ought to hold the scales of justice with unfevered hand would give me whatever was due Mr. Chalmers and whatever was due this citizen on the other side.

Mr. VALENTINE. Has the gentleman read all the letters?

Mr. BENNETT. I have read all that I have.

Mr. VALENTINE. Have you read the letter referred to by you in your opening remarks——

Mr. BENNETT. What letter?

Mr. VALENTINE. The letter in which the Attorney-General said it was not necessary that there should be a formal resignation.

Mr. BENNETT. I think I have read that, my friend.

Mr. VALENTINE. I did not hear you read it.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, I can help you with information; but I can not give you ears. [Laughter.]

Mr. VALENTINE. I did not hear the last remark.

Mr. BENNETT. It was nothing but a kindly remark made to you.

The contestant continued in the discharge of his duty as such assistant district attorney until February 26, 1884. While this contest was pending the Attorney-General, in answer to a letter of Hon. H. L. MULDROW, wrote: "Mr. Chalmers is still in the employ of the Government; there is therefore no resignation on file from him."

Mr. RANNEY. Does the gentleman claim that since that account was rendered by Mr. Chalmers in July 1883, he has rendered any service?

Mr. BENNETT. Certainly I do.

Mr. RANNEY. Where is the evidence?

Mr. BENNETT. You anticipate me.

Mr. RANNEY. I ask the question for information.

Mr. BENNETT. I will give it to you before I am through.

The question then comes up, is the place of special assistant to the United States district attorney for the northern and southern districts of Mississippi an officer? Upon this question hangs the law of this case as distinct from the facts; for I apprehend I shall be able to show by and by that there is exhibited in this record a state of facts which violates all official propriety and which this House can not possibly, with decent regard for its own dignity, condone.

Section 363 of Revised Statutes provides for the appointment of assistant district attorneys in the following words:

The Attorney-General shall, whenever in his opinion the public interest requires it, employ and retain in the name of the United States such attorneys and counselors at law as he may think necessary to assist the district attorneys in the discharge of their duties, and shall stipulate with such assistant attorneys and counselors the amount of compensation, and shall have supervision of their conduct and proceedings.

Section 366 provides:

Every attorney or counselor who is specially retained, under the authority of the Department of Justice, to assist in the trial of any case in which the Government is interested, shall receive a commission.

If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLIOTT] will reflect for a moment it will occur to him that in the course of a long practice at the bar he never was retained by a private client and commissioned in behalf of that client.

Mr. RANNEY. Is a letter of attorney anything but a commission?

Mr. BENNETT. Oh, yes; it is quite different.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Does not the gentleman think that when employed as an attorney by a private client I could always be compelled to file my power of attorney before acting in the case, so that it might be known I had authority to act?

Mr. BENNETT. The gentleman might be compelled to file it, not for the benefit of his client but for the benefit of the other side. The line of division in the two cases is perfectly distinct. Upon a rule served at the instance of the other side an attorney may be compelled to file the muniment of his office. Why? Because otherwise his client would have no standing in court.

Section 366 provides that every attorney or counselor who is specially retained, under the authority of the Department of Justice, to assist in the trial of any case in which the Government is interested, shall receive a commission from the head of such Department, as a special assistant to the Attorney-General, or to some one of the district attorneys, as the nature of the appointment may require; and shall take the oath required to be taken by law by district attorneys, and shall be subject to all the liabilities imposed on them by law.

The statute has never been construed by any judicial tribunal in this country. The nearest approach to a judicial opinion is that, I believe, of Mr. Lawrence. I do not remember exactly what position he occupies in the Treasury Department.

Mr. MILLS. He is the First Comptroller of the Treasury.

Mr. BENNETT. This statute is of recent adoption in this country. I speak subject to correction. I believe it first appeared in the statutes of the United States about the year 1870. The judicial decisions defining what is and what is not an office are numerous and plenary on this point, not indeed by direct construction of the statute, but by the forcible analogies of the law.

First, I call the attention of the Chamber to the case of Clark vs. Stanley, (66 N. C. R., 63). I will begin at home; I will go to my native mud. [Laughter.] The opinion comes from an eminent Republican court, one of the most eminent we ever had in that State. In that case the court says:

A public office is an agency for the State, and the person whose duty it is to perform it is a public officer. This we consider to be the true definition of a public officer in its original broad sense. The essence of it, the duty of performing an agency—that is, of doing some act or acts, or series of acts, for the State. Public officers are usually required to take an oath, and usually a salary or fees are annexed to the office, in which case it is an office coupled with an interest. But the oath, salary, and fees are mere incidents and constitute no part of the office. This definition also excludes the idea that a public officer must have continuance. It makes no difference whether there be but one act or a series of acts to be done; whether the office expires as soon as the one act is done, or is to be held for years, or good behavior.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Does that overrule a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. BENNETT. I am going up higher and higher. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELLIOTT. You have a long way to go to get there.

Mr. BENNETT. I travel very rapidly on the home-stretch. [Laughter.]

It did not occur to the gentleman from Pennsylvania when he said that if Mr. Chalmers were to die there would be no continuity in the office—it did not occur to him I say that the act providing for the appointment of this special assistant is of a continuing character; that it runs along pari passu with the life of the Government, and that the mortuary changes of individuals do not change its existence. Call it an original vacancy, if you choose, the act is there; the background is there.

United States vs. Maurice. (2 Brockenborough, 97). This was an action on bond of an agent of fortifications authorized by regulations of Department, and recognized by an act approved April 24, 1816. The question involved was, Was he an officer of the United States? The regulations prescribed his duties to be to provide materials and workmen, pay laborers employed, make an abstract of articles furnished, of labor performed, pay of mechanics, and of contingent expenses. The opinion of the court was by Chief-Justice Marshall, who decided that this agent was an officer of the United States.

Vaughn vs. English, (8 California Reports, 41); Shelby vs. Alcorn, (36 Mississippi Reports, 273). These cases and others that might be cited abundantly show that the position of special assistant district attorney is an office within the meaning of the sixth section of the first article of the Constitution. The appointment or employment is provided for by section 363 of the Revised Statutes, and his duties are prescribed by section 366. Within all the authorities this is an office. But it may be attempted to show that this employment only amounted to a contract between the Government and the contestee. A contract between the Government and an individual may certainly be made, to do any work that is imposed on the Government, and for which there is no provision of law as to how it shall be done, when the law does not create the position or place, and does not prescribe its duties. In such a case the contract takes the place of the law, and the rights, and duties, and obligations of both parties are defined not by law but by the terms agreed on, and neither can depart from them without the consent of the other.

United States vs. Hartwell, (6 Wallace, 393). The words "employ and retain," used in section 363, have been relied on to support the view that this is a contract and not an office.

It is the argument of the member from Pennsylvania, and he lays particular stress on the fact that the words "employ" and "retain" are the operative words in the two sections.

Section 169 of the Revised Statutes provides that each head of a Department is authorized to employ in his Department such number of clerks of the several classes recognized by law. Section 170 provides that no money shall be paid to any clerk employed in either Department at an annual salary as compensation for extra services unless expressly authorized by law.

So the words "employ" and "retain" are to be found bristling all through the statutes in connection with the appointment of those who have again and again been decided by the courts of last resort to be officers within the meaning of the law.

This question has frequently arisen in the House of Representatives, and it has been uniformly decided that the person holding a Federal office on or after the day when Congress meets is not elegible to a seat in the House. The question first arose in the case of Van Ness, in 1803. He was elected to Congress, and afterward, and before the first session began, he accepted the appointment of major of the militia of the District of Columbia, which he held at the time the question of his elegibility was before the House. By a unanimous vote of the House he was turned out and the seat declared vacant.

I do not suppose the average member of this House would regard any other office as quite so insignificant as that of a major of militia. I believe, according to the Georgia custom, a major's uniform is currently believed to consist of a pair of spurs and a paper collar. [Laughter.] Mr. Randolph, of Virginia, said, in reference to the Van Ness case:

> On a precedent so important as was about to be established by the vote of the House, it was unnecessary to say a word. He wished, however, the disposition of the House to exclude by unanimous vote even the shadow of executive influence should be recorded on their journals, for which purpose he called for the yeas and nays.

They were taken and were unanimous.

In the case of Baker, of Illinois, and Yell, of Arkansas, Twenty-ninth Congress, second session, found in contested-election cases from 1834 to 1865, page 92, the same principle was affirmed. Baker and Yell, after their election to Congress, accepted commissions as colonel of volunteers for the Mexican war. The committee reported that holding this office at the time Congress convened vacated their seats in the House under the clause of the Constitution already cited. The report also took the ground that the two positions were incompatible, and, under the fifth section of the first article of the Constitution, which declares that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," it was the duty of the House to declare their seats vacant. The report says, on page 93:

> The committee believe that to hold an office in the Army of the United States is incompatible with the office of a member of Congress, and that, therefore, the two offices can not be held at the same time by the same individual; that it is against the whole theory and spirit of our Government. The Constitution intended that the President should have no power to control the action of Congress in any respect; that it should be perfectly independent. Now, suppose every member was a colonel in the Army in the service of the United States, and the President, who, by the Constitution, is Commander-in-Chief of that Army, should come into the Halls of Congress, and order each member to retire immediately, under penalties inflicted for disobedience of orders, to his post in the Army, what would become of Congress? Or suppose, while Colonel Baker was making his speech here this session as a member, the President had come into this Hall and commanded him to be silent, or retire to his regiment in Mexico? Suppose in that speech Colonel Baker had spoken disrespectfully of his superior officer, the President, could he not be held responsible before a court-martial? To enlarge upon this argument is useless. To allow the two offices to be held by the same person would utterly destroy the independence of Congress and convert the country into a military despotism.

For further illustration of this principle, see the debate in the House on February 5, 1847.

The next case to which attention is called is that of Byington vs. Vandever, found in same book of contested-election cases, page 395. Vandever, after his election to Congress in 1860, was on the 30th of August, 1861, appointed a colonel of the Ninth Regiment of Iowa Volunteer Infantry. The committee in their report on this case say:

> He has no right as a Representative to absent himself from the House without leave; and if he does he is liable to be arrested by the officer of the House, and returned and punished. But he is also bound as an officer of the Army to be present with his regiment (perhaps a thousand miles distant), ready to execute the commands of his superior officer, and for his default is liable to punishment, it may be with death. Or his military superior may take him by force from his seat and duties in the House to his post in the Army. That such a physical impossibility as is thus created to execute the duties of both offices renders them incompatible would seem beyond a doubt.
> But there is this also in the nature of the powers incident to the two positions which renders them incompatible: As Representative he may, by his vote, repeal the law or Army regulation creating a duty or imposing a penalty, which, as an officer of the Army he has neglected or incurred. Or in the exercise of his right (and perhaps duty) as Representative to speak of the conduct of his superior military officers, he might utter words for which, as an officer of the Army, the superior would have equal right to cause him to be tried by court-martial and punished.

This reasoning fits the case of contestant perfectly. He is an officer of the Department of Justice, commissioned by that Department, and by section 360 of the Revised Statutes the Attorney-General may require him to perform any duty required of the Department or any officer thereof, and by section 366 he is subject to all the liabilities imposed by law on district attorneys. He has no right to absent himself from the House, and while performing duties there he may be, in discharge of his duties as assistant district attorney, compelled to be in Mississippi in prosecuting the cases specially committed to his charge as such assistant district attorney. As Representative he may, by his vote, change the law regulating his duties as assistant district attorney and increasing his compensation as such. He may, by his absence from the House, subject himself to arrest and penalties, and by his absence from the court in Mississippi disobey the directions of the Attorney-General. Or when in the discharge of his duties in Mississippi as assistant district attorney he may in the most critical period of such duties be taken by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House and carried to Washington. Clearly the duties of the two places are incompatible, and the House seat is vacant. The authorities are abundant and directly in point.

The case of Delarge vs. Bowen confirms this doctrine. In this case Bowen, after his election to Congress, had accepted the office of sheriff of the city of Charleston, and was in the discharge of the duties of this office when Congress convened. The House held the two offices incompatible, and declared the seat vacant.

The only other case that will be noticed is that of Blair (Report 110, first session Thirty-eighth Congress, pages 5 to 10). This case was heard and determined with that of Schenck. They were both elected to the Thirty-eighth Congress, and thereafter, and before the first session began, they were both commissioned as general officers in the Federal Army. Schenck resigned his commission in the Federal Army before the first session of Congress began, on the first Monday in December, 1863. Blair resigned his commission the 1st of January, 1864, in order to take his seat in the House, which had been in session about a month. The committee and the House decided that Schenck was entitled to retain his seat, but Blair was not, and the seat of the latter was declared vacant. In the report the committee say:

> The authorities are clear that the mere appointment or election to office, the duties of which are incompatible with those of one already held, will not vacate such office. This is true even in England, where the appointment to office can not always be avoided, and where once assumed it can not, as we have seen, be always voluntarily resigned by the incumbent. * * * The common law has been shown to be clear that the election alone to an incompatible office will not vacate one already held. The language of the Constitution is that "No person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office." The words are "shall be a member," not "shall be elected." No one can be made a member against his will. He may be elected without his consent or knowledge, for he may be in a foreign land, but to become a member he must not only be elected, but he must take the oath of office. * * * In the clause now under consideration the language is: "No person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office." No one doubts that the object of the constitutional inhibition was to guard the House against executive influence. This object is attained so far as it can be by this provision, if the inhibition attaches the moment the member enters upon the discharge of his duties as such, and nothing is gained by an earlier application of it.
> But this record raises another question, which, so far as the committee can learn, has not before arisen, and which it becomes necessary to examine. Mr. Blair was appointed a brigadier-general August 7, 1862, and a major-general November 29, 1862, the duties of which latter office he discharged till January 1, 1864, when he tendered his resignation, which was accepted January 12, 1864. On this latter day he qualified and took his seat in the House of Representatives. The first regular session of the Thirty-eighth Congress, fixed by law, commenced the first Monday in December, 1863. It therefore appears that Mr. Blair held and discharged the duties of major-general for more than a month after the commencement of the session fixed by law of the Congress in which, after resigning that office, he subsequently took his seat.

The only conclusion that can be drawn from the record is that Mr. Chalmers sought a position from which he was enabled to shield his partisans, and in the name of the United States persecute the friends of Mr. Manning, whose fidelity to him and the principles he represented had aroused the anger of contestant during the canvass.

He sought and obtained this position, which enabled him at Government expense and with the power of the Government to prosecute his claim for this seat in Congress.

By reason of this position he was enabled to summon witnesses on behalf of the United States, who, when they obeyed the process, were required to exhibit the private correspondence of Mr. Manning, though not a party to the case under examination. He was enabled to gain access to the grand jury, and under the protection of its secrecy, and without any danger of detection, he could turn this great engine provided for the protection of society to forward his ambitious schemes and wreak his vengeance.

How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has ten minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. BENNETT. I fear I shall not be able to conclude my remarks within the hour, and shall probably be required to ask an extension.

Now, whether disqualified under the sixth clause of the first article of the Constitution by reason of his holding this Federal office, it is insisted that under the fifth clause of the same article he should not be allowed a seat on the floor of this House. Under the last-cited section the House is the exclusive judge not only of the election but the qualification of its members.

It is deemed unnecessary to comment on the conduct of the contestant. As exhibited in the record, both before and subsequent to the election, it was so bad that to give him a seat in this House would set an example and a precedent calculated to sap the foundations of our representative system.

The committee in their report, on page 2, say:

Your committee, however, passing the question of whether this is an offense within the meaning of the Constitution, find that Mr. Chalmers was retained for a special purpose, and that prior to the time of the convening of Congress the matter for which he was appointed or employed had been disposed. His account had been rendered to and closed by the Department. No resignation had been made—none was necessary. Practically his connection with the office had ceased.

The record will be searched in vain for the facts stated in this extract from the report of the majority. On the contrary, it will appear from the evidence that Mr. Chalmers was appointed to assist in the election cases; that some of these cases were still pending in February last when this case was under argument and more than sixty days after this session begun.

It will also appear by the statement of the Attorney-General that Mr. Chalmers's account had not been closed and that his connection with the office had not practically ended. On the contrary, it will appear that Mr. Chalmers had not rendered his account in but a single case, that of The United States vs. E. M. Watson and others, and the Attorney-General expressly states that his account in that case is closed. There is no evidence that he ever rendered or closed an account with the Department in any other case, but he remained up to February still in the discharge of his duties as assistant district attorney with his account for services unsettled except as to the Watson case.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if this is a mistake on the part of the majority of the committee and "the matter for which he was appointed or employed had not been disposed of" "prior to the time for the convening of Congress," then the question still arises, Was his position an office within the meaning of the Constitution? The authorities I have already cited settle this question beyond all dispute, and it must be held, in accordance with the precedents relied on, that Mr. Chalmers can not take his seat.

The evidence fairly shows that Messrs. Raum, Hatton, Chandler, and Bruce (all officers of the United States Government), and Jay Hubbell, chairman of the Republican executive committee, brought about the candidacy of contestant. Register Bruce, at a critical moment, extinguished the aspirations of his colored brother, J. P. Little, by the following telegram:

Republicans here (Washington) do not think it would be wise to nominate a Republican candidate for Congress. Give Chalmers a chance at the Bourbons. (Record, page 126.)

Mr. RANNEY. Is there anything illegal about that?

Mr. BENNETT. If there is not anything illegal in it, there is a "damned spot" in it. If there is anything consecrated in the traditions of this country it is that the affairs of the States, the legitimate privileges of the States, their elections, and their laws shall not be invaded by the Executive, or by the General Government, or by any Department thereof. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Propriety, Mr. Speaker, may have fled the country. All sense of delicacy in these matters may be gone, and it may be that this generation "that knew not Joseph" are better in their principles than were the opinions and the traditions of the fathers. In the better days of the Republic an officer of an Executive Department of this Government would sooner have thrust his finger into the fire, would rather have gone shackled to the place of execution, than to have attempted an invasion in the affairs of the State at the time of an election. Anything improper in it! Do not shut your eyes to what is public history. Do not shut your eyes to the fact that an Executive Department of this Government, as is now commonly understood, has gone into a State that lies here under the very eaves of the Capitol to advance the ambitions and the projects of one who sits in the other end of the Capitol. Do not forget that the patronage of a great State has been given into the hands of a single citizen, all of it to be used in one monstrous attempt—an irresistible column—to break down the spirit of liberty that still lingers in the States. Do not, I repeat, shut your eyes to that which is current history. Do not shut your eyes to what is implied in this dispatch. Do not shut your eyes to the fact that there is more behind than appears on the face of this dispatch itself. It is incontestibly proven by implication that to get a seat upon the floor of this House he has turned his back upon kith and kin to make friends with those some time ago his enemies. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And nothing but the power of this General Government exercised from this safe quarter in his behalf would have taken him away from his public allegiance. He is the victim of too much patronage [laughter], and his people in that State are made the sufferers. Great God! It is enough to make the face of any independent, right-thinking citizen mantle with shame. It is enough to make any honest citizen who regards the Government as simply made to increase the amount of good and comfort for the citizens—it is enough to make him recoil and his flesh creep to see the patronage of the Government thus foully and most unnaturally abused.

Mr. Raum detailed two men, calling them internal-revenue collectors, to help Chalmers.

Cannon to right of them,
Cannon to left of them.

they gave their whole time to the work, and the account for their services was filed against the Government.

Mr. Hubbell "paid" Chalmers $250 "as a send-off," and afterward made other remittances for his benefit, the exact amount of which (above $1,250) could not be ascertained from the fund managers because they had burned the books of the committee soon after the election.

Did you ever see a cat retire—gone for a moment and then looking back with a cunning look as if she knew something that nobody else knew? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. VALENTINE rose.

Mr. LOWRY. I propose to take the floor and will yield to the gentleman from North Carolina such time as he may want.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina will proceed.

Mr. LOWRY. That there may be no want of unanimity, I will not claim the floor at this time but will yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. VALENTINE]. I will claim the floor afterward and will then yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT].

Mr. VALENTINE. If the gentleman from North Carolina is to speak any further on this case I would prefer that he should speak now. The gentleman in charge of the report, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COOK], told me he proposed to call the previous question in thirty-five minutes. Before that is done I desire to submit some remarks.

Mr. LOWRY. My friend from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT] suggests that you can lead a horse to the water but you can not make him drink. He does not desire to proceed now. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. VALENTINE], if it be agreeable to him, can proceed at this time, and I will afterward take the floor and afford my friend from North Carolina an opportunity to be heard further when he is a little refreshed.

Mr. COOK. It was my purpose when the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT] rose to take the floor under the thirty-five minutes I have left and yield the whole of that time to the gentlemen on that side and then to call the previous question. As I have thirty-five minutes remaining I will yield that time to the gentlemen on the other side and then ask for a vote. I ask that that arrangement be made by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that after thirty-five minutes of debate accorded to the minority the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. VALENTINE. I object.

Mr. LOWRY. I desire to afford the gentleman from North Carolina an opportunity to conclude his argument on this question. He certainly has not been wasting any time. I am willing on the other hand the gentlemen who espouse the other side of the question shall have ample opportunity to express their views, and I suggest it is entirely proper my friend from Nebraska should proceed now and that Judge BENNETT be allowed to finish after he has somewhat refreshed himself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Those arrangements are not within the power of the Chair.

Mr. HART. I think it is but fair that the gentleman from North Carolina should conclude his speech now, if he proposes to speak any further.

Mr. LOWRY. I have not yielded the floor. I believe I am recognized as still occupying the floor. I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. VALENTINE] is recognized.

Mr. VALENTINE. I shall not detain the House at any great length on this question. In fact, I do not know that I desire to argue the evidence in the case or the law to any great extent. I would not be disposed to say anything at this time upon this question, but would leave it to the members to vote upon as it is presented by the various members of our committee, if it were not for the fact that I believe it my duty, to myself at least, if not to other members of this committee, to call the attention of the House to what I at least consider unjust treatment at the hands of my friend—and I class him as such, I am glad to say—the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COOK]. I believe, and I desire to so state, that in the writing of this report and its submission to the House by my colleague he has used unnecessary and uncalled-for language. He was delegated by a majority of our committee to report in favor of the seating of Mr. Chalmers. The minority members of the subcommittee, together with two of the majority, gave from one to three hours per day for two weeks to the argument of this question. The question was argued at great length both upon the facts and upon the questions of law involved. The subcommittee, composed of three Democrats and two Republicans, were unanimous in their report to the full committee that Mr. Chalmers was duly elected and entitled to a seat on this floor. The chairman of our subcommittee was asked to make a report in accordance with the majority report of the full committee. For some reason he failed for a considerable length of time to make this report. Afterward the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COOK], the second member of the subcommittee, was asked by the full committee to make this report, and, as I at least presumed, to embody therein the views of the majority.

The language used here is not indorsed by any Republican member of the Elections Committee. We do not believe it warranted by the facts or by the evidence, and think that it ought not to have appeared in a report to this House. He has taken occasion to use language which he admits does not convey, or ought not to convey, the meaning that a casual reader would give it, and that is why I object to it.

I desire, without taking the attention of the House, to ask to have inserted as a part of my remarks upon this question the majority report. I will not ask to have it read, as it has been already read.

Mr. COOK, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the following:

The Committee on Elections submit the following report in the case of James R. Chalmers vs. Van H. Manning:

At the regular election for Representative in this Congress, in the second district of Mississippi, James R. Chalmers received a majority of the votes cast.

The certificate of election or commission, however, was given to the contestee, Van H. Manning. The facts and circumstances under which this was done fully appear in the report and proceedings on the question of prima facie right heretofore had.

In the contest on the merits Mr. Manning took the burden of the issue and sought to show that there was such interference in the election and canvass leading to it by the Executive Departments at Washington and Federal authorities in the district as to at least make the election void.

It appears that Mr. Chalmers, a short time before the election, was declared not elected to a seat which he occupied as a Democrat in the Forty-seventh Congress. Up to this time he had for years acted with the Democrats. Immediately after this he conferred with leading Republicans at Washington, and with members of the administration, arranging with them to aid him in securing the support of the Republicans of this district, in which he did not then reside. It is fairly proved that he had the active aid of the Departments at Washington and their subordinates in the district in the work of securing the support of the Republican party organization in his canvass, and the votes of its adherents, the great mass of whom are of the colored race.

While the evidence is not clear, yet it fairly shows facts that are a reproach to the civil service of the country.

Not only was much time for which some of the Federal officials were paid by the Government devoted to canvassing for the contestant, but their accounts for expenses incurred in the canvass were rendered to the Departments at Washington as incurred on account of the Government, although it does not appear that they were paid.

The committee appreciate the gravity of the issue thus presented; elections should be free from all corrupting influence.

The use of large sums of money in elections in many parts of the country is an element of danger, even though it be not used directly upon the voters.

That the Federal patronage and the influence of superiors may produce a strong and corrupting effect among a voting population such as this district contains must be admitted. The direct bribery of voters and corrupt use of money could not be much more baneful.

Again, it is of the highest importance that Congress should be a body free, as far as may be, from executive interference or dominance. No member should feel that he is in any degree indebted to the Executive Departments for the seat which he holds.

The use of the executive patronage and power is a growing evil, the force and effect of which all good citizens realize only to regret and condemn; nor can we close our eyes to the fact that this influence may be exercised with greater effect and more perniciously in one section of the country than another.

Believing that it is the duty of the House, whenever it is shown that the election of a member is the result of this influence, to declare the election void, and believing, further, that the testimony in a case is to be taken in connection with contemporaneous historical facts, your committee has given careful attention to the record and evidence in this case. We conclude that it can not fairly be said that the election of Mr. Chalmers was secured by such undue influence—that is to say, that without it he would not have been elected—especially in view of the large majority he received. It was perhaps more instrumental in making him the candidate of the Republican party and suppressing other aspirants for party support. But with this we think the House has no concern.

A large part of the evidence is calculated to show that the contestant was deceitful in his politics, treacherous to his political friends, and unworthy of so high an office. This, however, must address itself to the voters of his district, and the House has no right to render an unjust decision because a man lawfully elected may be subject to this criticism more or less.

It is next claimed that Mr. Chalmers, if legally elected, has since his election disqualified himself from holding this office by accepting another office from the United States and performing its duties within the term of office of a member of the Forty-eighth Congress, under the following provision of the Constitution:

"And no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office."

Because, on the 9th day of December, 1882, Mr. Chalmers was by the Attorney-General of the United States employed or appointed "special assistant to the district attorneys for the northern and southern districts of Mississippi," and that by retaining this position he had vacated his office as Representative.

Your committee, however, passing the question of whether this is an office within the meaning of the Constitution, find that Mr. Chalmers was retained for a special purpose, and that prior to the time for the convening of Congress the matter for which he was appointed or employed had been disposed of. His account had been rendered to and closed by the Department. No resignation had been made—none was necessary. Practically, his connection with the office of district attorney had ceased.

We recommend to the House for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That James R. Chalmers was duly elected as a Representative in the Forty-eighth Congress from the second district of Mississippi, and is entitled to be sworn in as a member of this House.

And I desire to follow that report in the RECORD with the views of the minority of the majority as submitted in the following report. I incorporate them as part of my remarks.

Views of dissent from some portions of the majority report in Chalmers vs. Manning.

It will be remembered that the House, upon a report of the committee, decided that the contestee was not entitled to be sworn in upon his alleged prima facie title, although he finally caused his certificate to be presented to the House and claimed such a right, notwithstanding what he had inserted in his answer. It appeared that the certificate was awarded to him by the State executive, because of, and in pursuance of, the action of the secretary of state, which was proved to have been illegal and fraudulent; that upon the returns the contestant, Mr. Chalmers, was elected and should have been so found by that officer and awarded the certificate.

Mr. Chalmers was thereby deprived of the benefits of the same, and both he and his district have, because of it and delay in the committee, been denied hitherto all the benefits of representation upon the floor of the House. After the decision had been made upon the question of prima facie title the case was before the committee for determination upon its merits. The record was not voluminous, and the questions of fact and law involved in the contest were not complicated or difficult of solution. An earnest endeavor was made on his part to get the case heard and determined speedily and without any unnecessary delay. The undersigned must be allowed to say, in justice to themselves, that they did all in their power to have this done, but to their great regret and extreme mortification the case has remained undetermined until now, so near the end of the session.

There was no evidence in the case upon which any reasonable claim could be made that Mr. Manning was elected, indeed none which furnished even a plausible pretext for such a contention. The contestant was chosen beyond all question by a large and a decided majority in an election fairly and honorably conducted. There was nothing so far to require any serious consideration or to raise any doubt whatever in our minds. Contestee did not, in his answer to the notice of contest, set up a claim, not directly at least, and he has presented no reasons to the committee, on the evidence or otherwise, tending to support a claim, that he was entitled to the seat on the merits.

It has been contended that contestant was not eligible, or rather that he had lost his right to a seat, because employed December 9, 1882, by the Attorney-General to act as counsel and aid the district attorneys in the prosecution of some criminal cases in Mississippi. His employment was a special one in the line of his profession, and it was in no sense an office which was incompatible with his holding the position of Representative to Congress. He was not awarded a certificate of election as the chosen Representative, but the same was awarded to, and was held by, another person, to wit, the contestee. He was only a contestant claiming the seat. He was employed and retained after the day of election for a special purpose, to assist the district attorneys for the northern and southern districts of Mississippi in the prosecution of certain criminal cases. The employment was authorized under the statutes of the United States. It was a special contract employment for special pay according to what he did, and not an appointment to fill any office created by law with duties prescribed and a salary attached.

There is no good reason for a claim that it was the holding of an office under the United States, which was incompatible with his being a member of this House under the provisions of the Constitution, even if he had been a member of that body. But whether it was or not, inasmuch as he was not then accredited as a member and another person was, and especially inasmuch as his employment had ceased, his services having been fully performed and ended before the Forty-eighth Congress met, he could not in any event properly be held to come within the provision of the Constitution referred to, either in its letter or spirit. (Contested Elections in Congress, 1779–1837, page 122; Hammond vs. Herrick, in same, p. 287; Earle's case, p. 314; Mumford's case, p. 316; Schenck's case; McCrary, sections 238, 244.)

The contestee, in his answer to the notice of contest and in his evidence adduced, seems to have bent and exhausted his energies in attempts to assail the personal character of contestant and in making grave charges against him of a personal nature, and against the Departments of the Government and some Government officials, evincing, as it seems to us and is claimed, a spirit of vindictiveness and malice more than a desire to deal with what constituted legitimate issues in an election contest. Charges were made by contestee of money having been used in the election for corrupt purposes, and against the conduct of deputy marshals, &c. There has been evinced on both sides in course of conducting the contest, in the briefs and otherwise, much acrimony of feeling and speech.

But what has been done on the part of the contestant has been chiefly in repelling the attacks of contestee, and under a provocation of the strongest kind. The purpose of the undersigned was to disregard all immaterial issues and personal attacks, and regard only what is a proper subject of decision and report. Nothing else was discussed in general committee. Nearly a unanimous decision was reached, and we had a right to suppose that the report was to be made accordingly. We have found to our surprise a report filed of quite a different character. The majority report is so drawn as to reflect upon the personal character of contestant, upon the Departments of the Government, Government officials, &c., and it indirectly charges or insinuates that money was raised and expended improperly, and that influence was exercised of a baneful character by high officials in the Government. This is done without warrant and against the evidence as we view it.

The evidence discloses that contestant had campaign funds from different sources, as follows, namely, $250 from Jay A. Hubbell, and that $1,000 was paid by D. B. Henderson to Mr. Buchanan for same purposes, making $1,235 in all. It is shown conclusively that this was all spent for legitimate general campaign purposes, and the items of disbursement are all accounted for, without conflict of evidence, and as properly expended.

On the other hand, the sum of $2,650 was contributed and spent by, or on behalf of, contestee in his attempted election. We annex references to the evidence and to the items thereof.

Amount paid Van Manning by national Democratic committee	$1,500
Amount paid by E. M. Watson by State Treasurer Hemingway	750
Amount paid E. M. Watson by Secretary of State Myers	100
Amount paid L. S. Dillard by Oxford Democrats	150
Amount collected by Watson in Holly Springs	150

We do not find that any of this was spent corruptly. But there is the following evidence tending to show that attempts were made by the use of money to corrupt voters or to detach persons from the support of contestant. We insert the same with comments made thereon by the contestant as found in his brief, and which seems to us to be fully warranted by the evidence.

Deposition of Scott Martin:

"Ans. to 1st int. My name is Scott Martin; 45 years old; and a farmer by occupation; reside at Batesville, county of Panola, and State of Mississippi, and belong to the Greenback party, and voted for Jas. R. Chalmers last year for a member to the 48th Congress from the 2d Congressional district of Mississippi.

"Ans. to 2d int. About eight days before the last election a telegram from Alfred Fields summoned me to Sardis, in said county. Fields told me that I could get $500 if I would change my influence from Chalmers to Ham. Carter; that I could get $300 cash down and the balance any time I called for it.

"After talking with him some time, Mr. J. T. Farthing, whom I understood to be a Democrat and supporter of Colonel Manning, came to the door of the room which we were in, about the time I had asked Fields who was to pay the money, and he said Mr. Farthing is one of the men who is attending to this business. Farthing said to Fields: 'Have you got him?' To which Fields replied: 'No; I am talking to him now.' Fields and I were locked in a room alone together until Farthing knocked at the door and called Fields.

"After some low private talk between Farthing and Fields at the door, Farthing left, and in about three-fourths of an hour he returned and called Fields out and talked with him some five minutes privately. Fields then came back into the room, and in a few minutes told me they wanted me over at the store. We went there and found J. B. Boothe, a Democrat, and supporter of Van H. Manning, who exhibited to me a written contract, which he read and asked me to sign, the language of which I can not remember, but in substance it required me to transfer my influence from Chalmers to Ham. Carter, who was a Republican candidate for Congress, and, as I understood, for the purpose of dividing the support of Chalmers and thereby secure the election of Manning. The contract read to me stated what I should say to the people to induce them to change. Mr. Farthing came into the back room during this time, but said nothing. I deferred giving them an answer until the next day, and then told Mr. Boothe I could not accept his proposition.

"Ans. to 3d int. I know of no other persons that were promised or received anything for the support of Manning during said election. I have stated all I know upon this subject.

"And further this deponent saith not."

(See page 100.)

"Ans. to 1st int. Alfred Fields said: I decline to be sworn or give any testimony in reference to any money offered me by the friends of Col. Van H. Manning, and time of conversation on the subject, and I will go to jail before I will give any testimony on the subject. As I did not desire to proceed to extremities with him, I return the interrogatories with this statement, which I certify to be true and correct.

"Given under my hand and seal of said court this the 13th day June, 1883.

[SEAL.] "S. R. BLANN, Clk."

(See page 91.)

We point next to an attempt to corrupt a minister of the gospel.

DEPOSITION OF J. G. JOHNSON.

"I am 53 years of age; my place of residence is Oxford, Miss.; occupation, preacher of the gospel; I belong to the Republican party; I voted for James R. Chalmers for a member of the Forty-eighth Congress, of second district of Mississippi; there was not any money paid, offered, or promised me by Van H. Manning, or any friend or supporter of his, or any one else to vote for him; but several weeks prior to the November election of 1882, in which Mr. V. H. Manning and James R. Chalmers were candidates for the Forty-eighth Congress, a Mr. William Swindoll came in my room, and in the course of our conversation Mr. Swindle asked me the following questions relative to the pending election: 'Johnson, who are you going to vote for in our coming election for Congress?' I replied 'that I had not decided to vote as yet, but should I do so, I should vote for James R. Chalmers.' Mr. Swindle replied, 'that he could not see how an intelligent colored man could vote for a man of so notorious a character, and who had made his war record so hideous to the people of your race.' I replied to the captain by saying 'that should I vote for Mr. Chalmers I should do so from the fact that he had been made the choice of my party.' Capt. William Swindle asked 'if I would take $50 and remain neutral (or not vote at all);' when I replied 'that no amount would induce me to do so.' He said 'he asked question as a joke, and had no other intention than to try of what metal I was.'"

(See page 93.)

See also testimony of A. J. Terry, page 66.

"Answers to cross-interrogatories:

"X 1st. In answer to 1st cross int'y he says: Nobody offered or paid me any money for Van H. Manning, but a man whom I met coming from Michigan City, and whom I did not know, said he would guarantee me $75 if I would work for Manning as I was working for Chalmers."

We next call attention to the admissions of Mr. E. M. Watson:

"Int. 2d. Did you have any conversation with J. B. Boothe, L. C. Standifer, or W. C. Parker, or either of them, or with any one else as to the necessity, propriety, or practicability of hiring or employing Scott Martin, Alfred Fields, J. E. Settle, or any colored men in any way to support said Manning as said candidate last fall for a seat in said 48th Congress? If yea, please state all that was said by you or them or either of them or by you and any one else upon the subject of hiring or employing any colored or white men to aid in any way the said election of said Manning. Please answer fully and particularly, giving all the facts.

"Ans. to int. 2d. I had a conversation with Mess. Standifer and Booth and several others at same time; with Mr. Booth about parties you named. One of the gentlemen above named, or, as I am inclined to think, Mr. Barber, who was present, said that Fields had informed him that Chalmers had paid to himself (Fields), Scott, Martin, Settle, and one Littlejohn $50 each, with promise of $200 more each, to secure their services. That part of this $200 was then overdue and unpaid, and the four were restless and impatient. That if he (Fields) had the money to repay to Chalmers the amount received he would support Ham. Carter and work for him if he could compensate him for his time, and that Scott Martin was the same way. This was in substance the information conveyed to me. I expressed the hope that these men would turn for Carter, and a willingness to subscribe to the fund for relieving their obligations to Chalmers. I don't remember any Mr. Parker, but I have met such a gentleman. I never had any conversation about securing services of parties named for Manning that I remember. They were very influential men with their race, as I was informed, and I would have been very glad to have seen them desert Chalmers.

"I understood they were at heart, at least Fields and Martin, for Carter, and I would have aided in any legitimate way to remove the obligation or temptation which I was informed kept them for General Chalmers. We discussed the information as to these men at length, and concluded that they had been bought for General Chalmers, and were really in sympathy with Carter. That we would be glad to see Carter have them; would let Carter know, if he did not already know, how matters stood, and furnish him money to pay back to Chalmers what he had paid them.

"Ans. int. 3d. I have already answered this.

"ED. M. WATSON."

(See pages 94, 95.)

The pretense that Scott Martin wanted to abandon Chalmers for Carter is completely refuted by Martin's testimony. And if his testimony was not absolutely true on this point, why were not Messrs. Farthing and Boothe examined to contradict him? Mr. Boothe is shown by the testimony to have been the confidential telegraphic correspondent of Mr. Watson, and would without doubt have promptly denied this statement if it was false.

Allusion is made in the majority report to interviews of contestant with officers, high officials in the Department of the Government. Contestee made a charge in his answer to the notice of contest, which we insert. He then examined those officials, and we insert the material portions of their evidence taken by him and appearing in the record:

Mr. Manning charges that Chalmers "having pretended for many years to be in full accord with the Democratic party, you, on the — day of ——, 1882, entered into a corrupt bargain with some of the members of the Republican Congressional executive committee, of which Jay A. Hubbell was chairman, and D. B. Henderson, secretary, whereby you were to be a candidate for Congress at said election, and if elected, to vote with their party, or as desired by the Federal administration on certain important party questions; in consideration for which it was agreed that said administration should use its power and make its appointments in said Congressional district in such manner as best to promote your election, and that money should be collected from Federal employés, and used as a corrupt fund in said district."

Testimony of D. B. Henderson (record, page 110):

"Question 25. Do you know, by hearsay or otherwise, that money was obtained for that district from the Federal employés in and for the State of Mississippi?

"Answer. I never knew or heard of any money being raised from Government employés in Mississippi, excepting that I presume circulars like those referred to above were sent to office-holders in Mississippi, as elsewhere, but not specially for Mississippi, or any district therein. And whatever was so raised went into the general fund of the committee, and was not specially appropriated to Mississippi. I heard a rumor to the effect that some friends of one Mr. Carter attempted to raise funds to induce him to run as an independent candidate in the interest of Mr. Manning, but touching this I have no positive knowledge. This latter money that I speak of, as I heard the rumor, was partly raised by some clerks from Mississippi in the Departments, and partly by Democratic friends of Mr. Manning.

"Q. 26. Do you know, from hearsay or otherwise, whether General Chalmers controlled the Federal patronage, or any part of it, for that district in the campaign of 1882?

"A. From some things that I know, my understanding is that General Chalmers did not control the Federal patronage of that district in 1882?

"Q. 27. What are those things that you know?

"A. I have in mind a letter which General Chalmers wrote to me, or else written by some friend for him, I am not clear which, making complaint that his wishes were not regarded touching some post-office change desired in Mississippi, and I understand the change desired has never been made; at least, it was not prior to the election in November."

That there was no such bargain is shown by the following testimony of W. E. Chandler, a member of the Cabinet:

"Q. 4. State the purport of the conversations?

"A. Mr. Chalmers stated to me in the summer of 1882, after he had lost his seat in the House—within a fortnight after, I think—that he was going back to Mississippi intending to run for Congress against Mr. Manning. He stated to me generally his plan of proceedings, to which I listened.

"Q. 5. State what were his general plans as developed in that conversation?

"A. The conversation lasted perhaps half an hour, and he did most of the talking. I can give the general substance of his talk. He spoke with bitterness of the treatment he had received from the Democratic leaders, and said he was determined to break up Bourbon Democracy in Mississippi; that he intended to run as an independent Democratic candidate against Manning; believed he could carry a large Democratic vote; believed the Republicans of the district would be glad to vote for him, and that he could be elected beyond a question, unless Republican influences outside of the State were brought to bear upon the Republicans of the district to induce them to nominate a straight Republican candidate. Such influences, he said, he hoped would not be exerted. He spoke of the Mississippi River message of the President; commended it as likely to make the Administration strong in the Mississippi Valley. He went over substantially the same ground traversed in his subsequent letter, announcing himself a candidate. I said very little. I said I hoped Manning would be beaten, and that I would think over what he had stated to me of his plans and purposes. I think I expressed my views generally and briefly with reference to the true policy of Republicans in Southern States—that it should be one of co-operation with every man without regard to past political antecedents, who should be willing to contend for a free ballot, an honest count, and popular education.

"Q. 6. Do you mean that your last answer embraces the purport of the several conversations between you and the contestant during the period referred to?

"A. It does—the substantial purport."

Testimony of G. B. Raum (see record, page 127):

"Q. 5. In your interviews with Chalmers was it discussed whether it was better for him to run as an Independent or Republican candidate?

"A. The first interview I had with General Chalmers was after he had declared his candidacy as an independent candidate. The policy of declaring himself as a Republican candidate I don't think was discussed at all. I stated to him very frankly that to entitle himself to the support of the Republican party of that district it would be necessary for him to convince them that he was sincerely devoted to the principles of a peaceful and fair election.

"Q. 6. Was the policy of running a Greenback candidate discussed in those interviews?

"A. It was not. I understand from General Chalmers that he expected to unite all the elements opposed to the Bourbon Democracy.

"Q. 7. In your interviews with Chalmers, did you promise him any aid in his canvass—pecuniary aid, or aid by patronage, or anything of that sort?

"A. I did not.

"Q. 8. You have stated in a former answer that the appointment of A. T. Wimberly as a revenue agent was spoken of by General Chalmers with approval. Did he express a desire for his appointment?

"A. Mr. Wimberly had been appointed before this interview.

"Q. 9. Why did he express his approval of the appointment?

"A. I suppose because he thought Wimberly would oppose the Bourbon Democracy."

To the same purport was the testimony of General Frank Hatton, page 123.

It will be observed that General Hatton's testimony was taken in 1883, and that all the exhibits of Chalmer's letters filed by General Hatton bear date after the election; and that there is no evidence in the record of any Federal appointment made upon the recommendation of Chalmers. And except the telegram asking for the appointment of Howry as postmaster at Oxford, which was not granted, there is no evidence of any application made by Chalmers for the appointment of any one to a Federal position until after the election.

The answer charges that John Mahon was appointed postmaster at Holly Springs, A. T. Wimberly and E. A. West revenue officers, "in pursuance of this corrupt understanding." The proof shows that Chalmers had nothing to do with the appointment of either. That he had nothing to do with the appointment of John Mahon will be seen by the testimony of G. M. Buchanan. (Record, page 45.)

The testimony of G. B. Raum and A. T. Wimberly shows that Wimberly was appointed on the recommendation of others before Chalmers knew anything about it, and before his canvass began. (See Record, pages 127-195.)

Edgar West was appointed entirely without the knowledge of Chalmers, and because he was an experienced revenue officer and was needed for some particular service. (See testimony of West, record, page 41.)

We leave the House to judge whether the statements made by the author of the majority report, directly or by innuendoes, "or as not clearly proved, but fairly shown," are justified by the evidence. This attempt to put heads of the Departments on trial incidentally, when it is not pretended that anything is proved which affects the validity of the election, and to state as facts things not proved clearly, but, as we say, wholly without evidence, and against credible evidence introduced by contestee himself, is to be deprecated, to say the least of it.

The author of the majority report has gone out of his way to allude to attacks upon contestant's character as a man, if not by a direct finding, by a statement of what the evidence is calculated to prove. His offense as charged seems to have been the abandonment of the Democratic party, or one portion of the same, he declaring and going for a free ballot and an honest count in opposition to what is called Bourbon Democracy; and the offense of Government officials, as charged or so far as shown, seems to be that they had sympathy with such efforts and as men were inclined to favor and encourage the same. Contestant replies to contestee; hinc illæ lacrimæ. He charges and endeavors to prove in turn improper conduct on the part of contestee, his supporters, and the managers of the campaign in his behalf, including Mr. Myers, the secretary of state, a conspiracy or an attempt to defeat an honest count and return of the vote as cast by getting other and supplementary returns, and withholding the canvass for that purpose in violation of law. There is some evidence on this point giving much countenance to such a charge. But as nothing was accomplished which effectuated that end and the illegal conduct of the secretary of state in falsely certifying the result of the election has already been exposed in a prior report and discussion, we did not and do not now deem it necessary or proper to deal with that collateral and immaterial issue. It is referred to now only for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the House the report of the member from Iowa [Mr. COOK], and the various personal and collateral issues raised.

The author of the majority report attempts to make it out that the civil service of the country has been disregarded and its obligations violated. Now, we do not care to enter into any discussion herein on the subject of civil service, or general morals, or to follow any bad example which has been set in endeavoring to make political capital out of a case which should be treated judicially only. But we feel bound to say, in view of the majority report, that we find nothing in the evidence of this case which justifies the charges made, directly or inferentially, in this respect in the so-called majority report. It is to be observed that no allusion is made by way of reference to, or in condemnation of, the conduct of the State officials of the State of Mississippi. Contestant, in his brief, was justified by the evidence and the facts on this point in saying what he did, as follows, namely:

"CANVASSING BY OFFICIALS.

"If it be a crime for Federal officials to canvass and make speeches for candidates does not the same rule apply to State officials? Of the four revenue officers—Buchanan, Burton, Wimberly, and West—Buchanan and Wimberly made speeches in Marshall, and Wimberly one speech only, at Tippah. Burton and West made no speeches at all. Of the State officials, in the cause of Colonel Manning, Governor Lowry and Treasurer Hemingway spoke in Union County, and Senator George spoke in Union, Tippah, Benton, Marshall, La Fayette, Panola, Tate, and De Soto.

"(See testimony, Burton, page 41; Buchanan, page 46; Senator George, page 89.)"

There is no reliable or sufficient evidence in the case which shows that the Government, or any officer thereof, improperly used patronage or other influence to affect voters, but the evidence is to the contrary thereof, as already quoted.

A charge was made that United States deputy marshals were improperly used, and that they improperly interfered in the election, but this charge wholly fails of proof, and it is proved to be utterly baseless. Contestee has failed entirely to vitiate any of the returns or to destroy any considerable number of the votes cast for contestant, and his charges and his evidence on this point are not worthy of serious consideration. We regret the necessity which has been forced upon us to express these dissenting views, because the majority report was made without our sanction, and purports, contrary to the fact, to represent the views of the majority, while we agree to the resolution reported.

We feel bound to say emphatically, in view of the fact that the majority report has been so drawn as to reflect upon the character of contestant as a man, that there is nothing in the case, as presented to us, that will warrant any such assumption, statement, inference, or innuendo. Of the conduct of the State officials, the secretary of the state, and that of the contestee, as connected with this contest and the election, we do not deem it proper to speak, and have not done so only so far as it bears upon material issues in this case or is proper to be alluded to in connection with the majority report.

A. A. RANNEY.
AUG. H. PETTIBONE.
SAML. H. MILLER.
EDWD. K. VALENTINE.
WM. P. HEPBURN.
ALPHONSO HART.

Mr. VALENTINE. Now, a word upon the question whether the position of assistant attorney is an office within the meaning of the Constitution, and then I will conclude. In the first place, I do not believe that the appointment of Mr. Chalmers or his retention under the statute was an appointment to an office within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States. After hearing an argument of many hours by very able counsel, citing all the authorities upon this question, after having read the authorities very carefully (and if time permitted I could give them at considerable length), after examining all the well-digested cases in the United States I think it safe to say that this employment is not an office within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States or within the meaning of any constitution of any State.

But I hold this as a legal question, and I believe I am stating but the formal ruling of the House on the question, conceding that this appointment as special assistant to the United States district attorney was an office, conceding that it was an office incompatible with that of member of Congress, yet the uniform decision of the House has been that if such office is vacated before the time at which the member-elect to Congress is given an opportunity to choose between the two offices, and he elects to retain that of a member of Congress, then he has a right to be sworn in as such. I hold that, under the uniform practice of this House, Mr. Chalmers not having received a certificate of election has at no time and has not yet the right to a seat in this House. That question is one to be determined by a vote of the members of this House.

If he be holding to-day an incompatible office with that of a member of this House, and to-day is the first opportunity given to him to decide as to which of the two offices he will retain and which he will reject, and he now comes forward and says that he will retain that of a member of Congress, it is perfectly lawful for him to do so. Admitting that he holds an incompatible office until he has a right to come before the bar of this House and take the oath administered to members of Congress, until that hour arrives he has the right to determine between the two offices. I therefore believe that if the House should determine, which it certainly can not do, that the appointment of Mr. Chalmers as special assistant to the district attorney was incompatible with his duties as a member of Congress, and if the House shall decide that he was elected, as it ought to do, as a member of this House, and he is given an opportunity to be sworn in, then for the first time is presented to him the right to choose between the two offices.

I submit that as my conviction on this question after a most careful and painstaking review of all the authorities I have been able to find or which have been cited by counsel on either side in this case.

When this case was submitted to the subcommittee I for one supposed that we were to hear it upon the evidence contained in the printed record presented to us. But when the case was called for hearing, and the counsel began their arguments, Mr. Manning admitted the election of Mr. Chalmers, and assumed the burden of proof to show that the election ought to be set aside. Then for the first time did we hear this question of an incompatible office. It was not raised in the pleadings, and was considered in the argument of the case without regard to any record made in the taking of the testimony. My friend from Iowa [Mr. COOK] suggests that members of the House on both sides desire to have a vote, and I will therefore not take up any further time of the House now, but will reserve any time that I may have remaining.

Mr. LOWRY. I had the floor some time since, and reserved my time for the purpose of yielding to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT], to whom I now yield such time as he may desire.

Mr. BENNETT. I desire to call the attention of this House to page 34 of the record, to the testimony of Abram Fulkerson, who testifies as follows:

I reside in Goodson, Washington County, Virginia. I am a Democrat. I was a member of the Forty-seventh Congress of the United States. I was elected to the Forty-seventh Congress as a Democratic Readjuster, by an organization known in Virginia at that time as the Readjuster party. Some time before the adjournment of the first session of the Forty-seventh Conpress—I do not remember the month or day—I went to the public office, in the Treasury building, of Green B. Raum, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, on business for some of my constituents. When I entered General Raum's office I found him engaged in what seemed to me earnest conversation with John R. Lynch, who had theretofore been seated by the House of Representatives in place of J. R. Chalmers, of Mississippi. After the usual civilities General Raum requested me to be seated, and resumed conversation with Lynch in a loud tone of voice and with some animation. I can not undertake to give the language of General Raum, who did the most, if not all the talking. The substance of the conversation was this: General Raum resumed by saying, we have given General Chalmers the patronage in Mississippi, Mr. Lynch, for the purpose of trying an experiment. The Republican party in your State, as indeed in all the South, is a failure, as you know, and the reason of the failure is because there are so few white people in it. Now, we have given Chalmers the patronage in Mississippi, to be used among the white people with the hope of drawing them to our party.

A MODERN DANIEL.

It is an experiment, and if that fails we had as well abandon the party in your State. If you were given the patronage, you would use it among Republicans, and of course add nothing to the strength of the party. We must have more white men in our party in the South, and you and your people ought to allow us to make this experiment without complaint. We are trying the same experiment in Virginia, and General MAHONE reports fair progress. Lynch made some reply indicating that he was not satisfied, and left the office.

Answer to cross-interrogatories. I have stated as nearly as I can where the conversation between Raum and Lynch occurred. It occurred in the public office of Green B. Raum, in the Treasury building, in the city of Washington, D. C. I was present on public business; that was, to make application for the establishment of a stamp agency at Abingdon, a town within the Congressional district which I represented. Why I happened to hear the conversation was because it was spoken in an audible tone in my presence.

Mr. RANNEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BENNETT. Certainly.

Mr. RANNEY. Will the gentleman say as a lawyer and a judge (for I believe he has been one) that that is competent evidence in this case to prove any fact?

Mr. BENNETT. Unquestionably, to show the animus.

Mr. RANNEY. Of whom?

Mr. BENNETT. Of these conspirators.

Mr. RANNEY. Is not the evidence of Mr. Raum in direct conflict with that?

Mr. BENNETT. No, sir.

Mr. RANNEY. Then you have not read it.

Mr. BENNETT. I will read it.

Mr. RANNEY. Read the testimony of Mr. Raum.

Mr. BENNETT. There is nothing in this record that I need keep back.

Mr. RANNEY. But that is a conversation between Mr. Lynch and Mr. Baum?

Mr. BENNETT. Yes, sir; and it is testified to by Mr. Fulkerson.

Mr. RANNEY. But that is not competent here.

Mr. BENNETT. Now, I respectfully, but with a great deal of misgiving, differ from my honored friend from Massachusetts. It may be, as my friend is running by sight, with his eye fixed on one point only, he is entirely correct from his standpoint. But to show the animus of these parties, to show the internal working of the machine, this evidence is unquestionably competent:

I inferred from that portion of the conversation which occurred after I entered Raum's office that Lynch was seeking the control of some or all the patronage in his district, and that he had complained because it had been given to Chalmers.

I can not state that Lynch was politically or personally inimical to Chalmers at the time this conversation took place. During the time of the contest in the House between Lynch and Chalmers I understood Lynch to be politically inimical to Chalmers, as he professed to be a Republican, while Chalmers professed to be a Democrat. My understanding at the time of, and before the conversation referred to took place, was that Chalmers had agreed to try the Mahone experiment in Mississippi; that is, to act with the Republican party in the future on condition that the administration would give him control of the public patronage in that State.

Now, let me read from page 111 of this record:

Jay A. Hubbell, being duly sworn, deposed as follows in answer to questions by General Eppa Hunton:

Q. 1. Had you or not any official connection with the Republican Congressional campaign committee of 1882; if so, state it.

A. I was its chairman and acting treasurer. At the organization of the committee I was named as acting treasurer. No treasurer was ever elected, and so I continued to act, and appointed Thomas R. Stuart as assistant treasurer.

Q. 2. Did you keep books of the receipts and disbursements of your committee?

A. We kept first a receipt-book, with a large space for stub, on which was entered the amount received from an individual, date of its reception, his name and residence, and filled up the receipt from the stub, and sent it the party sending any money, and these amounts were carried forward from page to page. We also kept a cash account and a bank account. Our disbursements were shown in the committee-rooms by the stubs of our check-books, and all moneys paid out or disbursed were so paid by check, and all moneys received were deposited in bank.

Q. 3. Did you draw the checks in the distribution of the funds of your committee?

A. Only for a very short time, with perhaps two or three exceptions. As soon as the assistant treasurer was appointed he drew the checks as assistant treasurer, and they had to be countersigned by the secretary before they could be honored at the bank. The only exceptions I remember are that I drew the checks for the payment of the secretary's salary.

Q. 4. Why did you not continue to draw checks for the distribution of the fund?

A. In the first place, because I was not often at the committee-rooms, and mainly for the reason that the papers were charging that I might be using the funds of the committee to carry on a canvass I had in Michigan. And to avoid any question being raised on that point I required that checks should be drawn as above stated, and that all disbursements for campaign purposes should be made by the secretary.

Q. 5. What were the funds of your committee called?

A. Cash—money. Their right name was Republican campaign fund; but they were called Hubbell's corruption fund, and every other name that one could think of.

Q. 6. Do you know General Chalmers, the contestant in this case; and, if so, how long have you known him?

A. I know General Chalmers, and have known him ever since he has been in Congress.

Q. 7. Did you have any interview with General Chalmers about the time he was turned out of the Forty-seventh Congress?

A. I remember having an interview with General Chalmers about that time in the parlor of the Riggs House in this city.

Q. 8. Please state who was present at that interview and what was the subject-matter of it.

A. One morning I met General Chalmers in the office of the Riggs House, and he said he wanted to have a talk with me about the situation in Mississippi, or affairs in Mississippi, and wanted to know when he could have an interview with me for that purpose. I asked him how long it would take. He said not a great while. I then told him that if he would wait until I got my breakfast I would see him then. I ate my breakfast, met him, and went into the sitting-room and sat down. General Chalmers then began to talk about Mississippi politics, the attitude he proposed to take with respect to them, and what he proposed to do. He said that he was satisfied in his own mind that there was no hope for better times in Mississippi, politically, unless Democratic Bourbon rule in that State could be broken or overthrown. He said, in response to my question as to what he proposed to do, that he should return to Mississippi and announce himself as an independent administration candidate for Congress, and wanted to know if I would be willing, in behalf of the committee, to aid him in making the race. I replied that we were not helping in that sort of a fight, and would not entertain the question of assisting him unless he was indorsed by the Republicans of the district.

After quite a long conversation, during which I was trying to ascertain whether or not he really meant to make the fight, I became satisfied that he did. I said to him, "Now, general, I am satisfied that you really intend to make the fight for Congress in your district, and I am anxious to have you do it, because I believe that if you and Mr. Manning get by the ears in that district, the result will be that we shall have a full vote there, a fair count, and that a Republican will in that event stand a pretty good show for winning the race." The general said that he had been to a good deal of expense in making his contest, and alleged other reasons why he was short of money and wanted me to assist him, and urged that there was no better way of spending money than by doing so, if I really wanted a Republican from that district. After talking that subject over pro and con for some time I said to the general, "You go down there and make the race in your district as you have talked here. I will give you $250 as a send-off, but it must be upon the distinct understanding that the committee is to have nothing further to do with your fight and to furnish you no further aid either in money or otherwise." The general said, "Suppose the Republicans of the district nominate me, what will you do then?"

Now we are coming to the point, and it is very interesting:

I replied, we will consider that question when it comes up, as we will consider other questions when they arise.

He does not add that he winked at him at this point, but I suppose he did. [Laughter.]

The general said he was in a hurry to get away, and I replied, "Call here this evening and I will pay you the money." He called in the evening and I did so, in the mean time having collected the money from some Republican members of Congress at the House. [Laughter.]

The names of the persons contributing are not given. If they were I would read them. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANNEY. Will the gentleman allow me a question right there?

Mr. BENNETT. With the greatest pleasure.

Mr. RANNEY. Does it not appear, and is it not undisputed, that Mr. Manning received from the national Democratic committee at one time $1,500, and in all $2,650, and that one of those who contributed was Mr. Myers, the secretary of state?

Mr. BENNETT. Are you completely done?

Mr. RANNEY. That is my question.

Mr. BENNETT. I will come to that directly. You are running by sight altogether.

Mr. RANNEY. I am going by the record.

Mr. BENNETT. I am very fond of you, but you get powerfully contrary sometimes. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANNEY. Well, is not what I have just stated true?

Mr. BENNETT. I will come to that:

Blanche K. Bruce, being duly sworn, deposes as follows, in answer to questions by General EPPA HUNTON:

Q. 1. State your name, age, residence, and occupation.

A. Blanche K. Bruce; age, 42; residing temporarily, Washington, D. C.; legal residence, Mississippi. I am Register of the Treasury.

Q. 2. Are you acquainted with the contestant in this case, J. R. Chalmers? If so, how long have you known him?

A. I am, and have known him since 1873. For some years he practiced law in the courts of Bolivar County, of which county I was sheriff.

Q. 3. Have you had any interviews with said Chalmers on the subject of politics since January, 1882? If so, give their purport and the date of first one.

A. Yes; I have had in all perhaps a half dozen interviews with General Chalmers. The first one occurred about three days, I think, after he was turned out of the House of Representatives. He informed me that he had determined to become an independent candidate for Congress in the second district of Mississippi, and he believed that he could be elected if the Republican party would place no candidate in the field. I replied that if he and others would likely act with him, would give assurance to the colored people of the State that they would favor a revision of the criminal laws of the State, an improvement of the school system, and fair elections, he would, in my judgment, receive the support of a very considerable number of the Republicans. This he said he would do.

Q. 4. Did you or not send to J. T. Settle, who was at that time a colored Republican candidate for Congress in that district, a telegram substantially as follows: "Our friends of the committee think you should retire in favor of General Chalmers?"

A. I sent J. T. Settle a telegram, but I do not believe that I used the language which you have just used. I will repeat from memory the telegram in question. It was in substance as follows: "Republicans here do not think it would be wise to nominate a Republican candidate for Congress. Give Chalmers a chance at the Bourbons."

Q. 5. Do you know whether any aid was furnished to that district in the canvass of 1882?

A. I do not know what aid was furnished. I have heard that the committee furnished $1,000. This information was given me by General Chalmers himself.

B. K. BRUCE.

Let me read further. I refer to page 25 of this record:

HOLLY SPRINGS, MISS., 9.27.

Col. D. B. HENDERSON, Washington, D. C.:

The delay as to the Oxford post-office appointment is hourly hurtful. Urge Hatton to act immediately.

JAS. R. CHALMERS.

"Help me, Cassius, or I sink!" [Laughter.]

Mr. RANNEY. If that is the letter of Mr. Chalmers, I hope the gentleman will read the whole of it.

Mr. BENNETT. I will read till you get surfeited.

HOLLY SPRINGS, MISS., October 25, 1882.

Hon. HATTON, Asst. Postmaster-Genl., Washington:

Delay in appointing Hawry postmaster Oxford injuring us hourly. Will you act at once?

GEO. M. BUCHANAN.

WASHINGTON, D. C., 10.21.

A. T. WIMBERLY:

Better win a battle or two on what you have had. You push too hard.

D. B. HENDERSON.

[Laughter.]

But let me read the next dispatch. It appears that the gentleman over the way [Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa] could not stand the pressure any longer:

WASHINGTON, D. C., 10.25.

Hon. GEO. M. BUCHANAN:

Draw on me for $500. Answer.

D. B. HENDERSON.

HOLLY SPRINGS, October 26, 1882.

Hon. D. B. HENDERSON, Se'cy, Washington:

I have drawn $500 as directed. Much obliged. Prospects bright.

GEO. M. BUC.

HOLLY SPRINGS, October 26, 1882.

Gen. JAS. R. CHALMERS, Sardis:

Henderson telegraphs me to draw on him for $500, which I done at once.

GEO. M. BUCHANAN.

WASHINGTON, D. C., 10.27.

Hon. GEO. M. BUCHANAN:

Draw on me for another five hundred, and notify the interested. Answer.

D. B. HENDERSON.

HOLLY SPRINGS, October 28, 1882.

To Hon. D. B. HENDERSON, Washington, D. C.:

Have drawn, as directed, another five hundred. Could use more advantageously.

[Laughter].

Thanks. [Laughter.]

His gratitude seems to have consisted of "a lively sense of favors expected."

Certain of election unless rob'ed more than ever before.

GEO. M. BUCHANAN.

HOLLY SPRINGS, October 28, 1882.

Gen. JAS. R. CHALMERS, Sardis:

Henderson telegraphs Buchanan to draw another $500 and notify interested. I have the money in my pocket. Meet you at depot morning.

JNO. BURTON.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the situation is becoming magnificent:

HOLLY SPRINGS, October 30, 1882.

Hon. D. B. HENDERSON, Washington:

Do let me draw on you again. Waxing warm; both sides full array. Give if possible and say what amount. Answer.

GEO. M. BUCHANAN.

[Great laughter.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., 10.30.

Hon. GEO. M. BUCHANAN:

Out of our power. We have already exceeded all assurances to you.

D. B. HENDERSON.

Mr. HART. Will the gentleman from North Carolina state how much Mr. Manning received?

Mr. BENNETT. Certainly, if I could.

Mr. HART. Did he not receive $2,500 or $2,600?

Mr. BENNETT. Have you finished your statement? If you have, it is not necessary that I should weary the patience of this House by going over it again. The gentleman I suppose has stated it.

Mr. RANNEY. Have you Van H. Manning's dispatches?

Mr. BENNETT. I have not, but if you have them you can read them in your own time. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLS. Do not let them interrupt you; but continue your speech, as it is a good one.

Mr. BENNETT. Let them interrupt me as much as they please; they are not going to make anything out of me.

Yes, sir, if Mr. Manning had fought that contest in the State of Mississippi single-handed and alone against Mr. Chalmers and the proof were made here he was aided by moneys, unhallowed moneys, if his majority were 10,000 I would stand here and fight until I dwindled down to the size of a cake of soap before I would consent to his admission to the floor of this House. Do not let these astute gentlemen who are full of excuses and rheum, do not let them disguise the real issue in this case by talking about what Mr. Manning got. It is not a question whether you will seat Mr. Manning, but the question is whether the unhallowed means used by that citizen who is over yonder, whether his action from first to last, whether, covered all over as he is by badges of suspicion and turpitude, whether you will let him in here as a member of this House. That is the question, sir, and not whether Manning is to come in or not. Mr. Manning is not seeking to be admitted.

Now, can this Congress afford to put itself on the pinnacle of infamy by admitting to the privileges of this House a citizen like that?

Mr. HART. Put it the other way.

Mr. BENNETT. "Let the galled jade wince, my withers are unwrung." [Laughter.]

Can this House afford to put itself on the pinnacle of infamy by admitting to the privilege of this floor a citizen who turned his back upon his race, "heroes of all the ages; foremost in the files of time?" Can it afford to admit a man who covered himself all over with the mantle of mercenary help to the privileges of this floor? If you can, then go on and let the country understand it. Tell it everywhere. I will talk it all around and the country shall know of it.

Now, there is abundant testimony of this sort in this record, plenty of it, sir; but I will not further detain the House. I have already transgressed upon the patience of members; I will not fatigue them further. I ask this House before they take this last step to consider well the attitude it will occupy before the country. If it is to be so, let it go forward and admit him to a seat; but, sir, in my judgment, a Representative in this House on this floor ought to stand before the country and his colleagues like Aaron before the children of Israel, a clean man. [Applause.]

Mr. COOK. I yield now for four minutes to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to discuss this case, because the questions have been already presented fairly to the House. I simply desire to state that I regret exceedingly to be compelled to dissent from the view so ably presented by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLIOTT]. I believe that the relations which Mr. Chalmers sustained to the Government, under the facts disclosed in this record and in these reports, constituted incompatibility with his position on this floor. But I agree with the finding of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in that view of the case in which he stated that this official relation to the Government had ceased prior to the period at which his legislative duties could have begun. If that were an original question I should have no difficulty in coming to a different conclusion from that which I now entertain, but the precedents have settled the rule that an incompatible place may be held up to the beginning of the legislative session. I was not willing, sir, at this late day, to undertake to override these precedents to defeat an obnoxious person.

I believe, however, sir, if he had held this place after the time when his legislative career should have begun I should have been found among those who would have been willing to rebuke with something of emphasis the confusion of departments—the legislative, executive and judicial—and the thrusting into this Hall of the least trace of executive influence. That is all I desire to say.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. YAPLE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled joint resolutions and bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 138) for printing the annual reports of the United States Geological Survey;

A bill (H. R. 2346) for the relief of Sarah A. Redmond;

A bill (H. R. 4652) for the relief of Saint Luke's Protestant Episcopal church, in the District of Columbia;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 264) to amend a resolution approved August 7, 1882, providing for the publication of report of Public Land Commissioner;

A bill (S. 1727) to grant letter-carriers at free-delivery offices fifteen days' leave of absence in each year; and

A bill (H. R. 4678) to remove certain disablities of Henry Newman.

CONTESTED ELECTION—CHALMERS VS. MANNING.

Mr. COOK. Mr. Speaker, before calling the previous question I beg the attention of the House again for a moment. My friend from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT] has read the telegrams that passed between my friend and colleague from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] and Mr. Burton. There is nothing to show that one dollar of that money was used corruptly to influence a voter. On the contrary, it is accounted for by showing how it was expended. I say this, as I feel under some obligation to my colleague from Iowa, and I do not want the House to become prejudiced against him. He did not pay this over until after the Republicans had nominated Mr. Chalmers; then he paid it over to the committeeman. The proof shows that none of it reached the voters; it all stuck in the pockets of the campaign managers, where I trust any similar fund may in future always go.

Mr. COBB. I would like to hear an explanation from the gentleman as to how that money was used.

Mr. COOK. It was expended in conducting the canvass by paying expenses which necessarily and ordinarily arise on such occasions; but, as I have said, not a dollar of it was used for the purpose of influencing a voter.

Mr. COBB. I did not know but that it had been used to build a church or something of that kind.

Mr. COOK. No, sir; it was used just as I have stated.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I would be glad if my colleague would yield to me to answer that question of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COOK. I regret that I can not yield any further. I have, however, said enough to absolve my colleague from any blame in connection with the distribution of that fund—the Hubbell fund.

Now, with regard to anything else that was done in that district which in the judgment of the House would address itself to the consideration of the Committee on Civil-Service Reform, we must not forget the fact that the subcommittee of the Committee on Elections that heard this evidence, three of whom, myself included, are as emphatic in denouncing any interference in elections by Federal patronage as any man on the floor of this House or elsewhere, and would, I say again, go as far as any man on this floor to declare an election void when it is shown that election is due to the interference of any branch of the executive department, failed to find anything in the evidence in connection with the historical facts contemporaneous with this transaction that would warrant us in saying that the election of Mr. Chalmers would not have occurred without it.

I repeat, it is not sufficient to show that improper influences were at work or even corruption practiced, but must also find that to this he owes his election, before we could declare the election void.

Now, a word in answer to my genial friend from Nebraska [Mr. VALENTINE], who thought it proper to criticise the report which I had the honor to submit. I realized the delicate position in which I was placed in the preparation of that report. My idea of a report from a committee to this House is that it should show the conclusion of fact found by the committee from the proof, and also the conclusions of law reached by them. I made my report as to the facts and to meet the approval of the committee. It does meet the approval of nine out of the fifteen members of the committee, and with that I am content.

Again, I say the whole report must be taken together. The conclusion we arrived at must be taken as a whole and properly considered by every gentleman who casts his vote upon this question.

I now demand the previous question upon the resolution of the committee, and also the resolutions submitted as a substitute by the minority of the committee, and ask that they may all be considered as pending, without regard to the fact that the substitute has not been formally offered, for I do not wish to be technical.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The substitute reported by the minority of the committee will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the means and methods employed by the Federal administration in securing the election of James R. Chalmers as a member of the House of Representatives of the Forty-eighth Congress are, as appears by the majority.

report and the evidence on file, repugnant to and subversive of true representative government, and the said election is therefore declared void.

Resolved further, That said Chalmers having accepted the office of special assistant United States district attorney for the northern and southern districts of the State of Mississippi, since the said election, and holding said office up to and beyond the 1st day of February, 1884, is ineligible to a seat in this Congress, and a vacancy exists in the second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution just read as a substitute for the resolution reported by the majority of the Committee on Elections.

Mr. BENNETT. Under correction from the Chair, if I am not authorized to make the request, I ask a division of the resolution, so that a separate vote may be taken upon the concluding resolution first, being the following:

Resolved further, That said Chalmers having accepted the office of special assistant United States district attorney for the northern and southern districts of the State of Mississippi since the said election, and holding said office up to and beyond the 1st day of February, 1884, is ineligible to a seat in this Congress, and a vacancy exists in the second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is a complete proposition by itself, and that the gentleman is entitled to a separate vote upon it.

The question is first upon the adoption of the second resolution reported by the minority, which the Clerk will again report.

The second resolution of the minority was again read.

Mr. BENNETT. Upon the adoption of that resolution I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered—12 members only voting in favor thereof.

The question was taken upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BENNETT. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 36, noes 98.

So (no further count being demanded) the second resolution was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire a vote upon the remaining part of the resolution?

Mr. BENNETT. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the remaining resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the means and methods employed by the Federal administration in securing the election of James R. Chalmers as a member of the House of Representatives of the Forty-eighth Congress are, as appears by the majority report and the evidence on file, repugnant to and subversive of true representative government, and the said election is therefore declared void.

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri, Mr. MILLS, and others demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 56, nays 163, not voting 104; as follows:

So the first resolution reported by the minority of the committee was not agreed to.

Mr. COOK. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names of members voting.

There was no objection.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. GARRISON with Mr. JOHNSON, for this day.

Mr. TULLY with Mr. WAKEFIELD, for this day.

Mr. PUSEY with Mr. MCCOID, for this day.

Mr. HOUK with Mr. BURNES, on this vote.

Mr. PRICE with Mr. SUMNER, of Wisconsin, on the Chalmers vs. Manning contest.

Mr. ROBERTSON with Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, in the Manning vs. Chalmers case.

Mr. THROCKMORTON with Mr. HARDEMAN, on the Chalmers vs. Manning contest. Mr. THROCKMORTON would vote to seat Mr. Chalmers and Mr. HARDEMAN would vote against seating him.

Mr. ELLIS with Mr. KELLOGG.

Mr. PERKINS. I voted in the negative on this vote. I am paired with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SKINNER]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. TULLY. I am paired with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WAKEFIELD]. He would vote "no" and I would vote "ay."

Mr. GOFF. I did not vote, under the impression that I was still paired with my colleague from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON]. I am informed the pair is withdrawn. I ask leave to record my vote.

There was no objection.

Mr. GOFF. I vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the adoption of the resolution reported by the majority of the committee.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. COOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. R. CHALMERS appeared and qualified by taking the oath prescribed by section 1757 of the Revised Statutes.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. YAPLE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 1076) granting a pension to Miles B. Farlin;

A bill (H. R. 1340) to establish a bureau of labor statistics;

A bill (H. R. 2400) for the relief of Judith Lauter;

A bill (H. R. 4411) to provide for the administration of oaths to witnesses in matters pending in either House of Congress;

A bill (H. R. 4707) granting a pension to Eliza V. de Kilpatrick, widow of Maj. Gen. Judson Kilpatrick;

A bill (H. R. 4981) granting a pension to Isabella J. Ramsdell;

A bill (H. R. 5458) to remove the disabilities of Robert D. Thorburn of Virginia;

A bill (H. R. 6021) to authorize the National Bank of Middletown, Pa., to change its location and name; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 137) for printing the annual reports of the Bureau of Ethnology.

BACKBONE RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

Mr. LEWIS. I call up as a privileged report the bill (H. R. 5682) reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5682) to repeal section 22 of the act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, approved March 3, 1871, and to declare the forfeiture of the land grant therein made, and for other purposes.

Mr. TUCKER. I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia raises the question of consideration on the bill called up by the gentleman from Louisiana. The question is, Will the House now proceed to the consideration of this bill?

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 22 of the act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1871, which reads as follows, to wit, "That the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, chartered by the State of Louisiana, shall have the right to connect by the most eligible route, to be selected by said company, with the said Texas Pacific Railroad at its eastern terminus, and shall have the right of way through the public land to the same extent granted hereby to the said Texas Pacific Railroad Company; and in aid of its construction from New Orleans to Baton Rogue, thence by the way of Alexandria, in said State, to connect with the said Texas Pacific Railroad Company at its eastern terminus, there is hereby granted to said company, its successors and assigns, the same number of alternate sections of public lands per mile, in the State of Louisiana, as are by this act granted in the State of California to said Texas Pacific Railroad Company; and said lands shall be withdrawn from market, selected, and patents issued therefor, and opened for settlement and pre-emption, upon the same terms and in the same manner and time as is provided for and required from said Texas Pacific Railroad Company within said State of California: Provided, That said company shall complete the whole of said road within five years from the passage of this act," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That the land grant therein made to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company be, and is hereby, declared forfeited by said company for non-compliance with the conditions of the grant; and the lands granted to said company are hereby restored to the public domain, and from and after the passage of this act shall be subject to entry and settlement under the laws of the United States: Provided, That all persons who have first settled in good faith upon these lands prior to the 1st day of January, 1884, and who are now in occupation of the same in good faith, shall have the prior right of entry thereon, either under the homestead or pre-emption laws: Provided further, That said entries shall be limited to one hundred and sixty acres in each case, and at a price not to exceed $1.25 per acre.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, if I can get the attention of the House I shall endeavor to state as briefly and as clearly as I can the facts of this case. In 1869 the State of Louisiana incorporated what was called the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company; the act authorizing that company to build a road commencing in the parish of Livingston, and running due north through the State of Louisiana to the line between the States of Louisiana and Mississippi; the road terminating at Vicksburg, in the State of Mississippi. The charter provided for lateral branches running east and west; so that the company received the name of Backbone, because of the fact that it was a line running due north and south through the State with lateral branches provided for. That is why it was called the Backbone railroad. This road was by the act of the Legislature of Louisiana located on the east side of the Mississippi River up to Baton Rouge. As I have said, this charter was passed in 1869. The company was organized soon after the charter was passed.

In 1871 the charter of the Texas Pacific Railroad Company was passed by Congress, and in the twenty-second section of that act a grant was made to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company chartered by the State of Louisiana. The granting act provided that the land given was in aid of the construction of the road from New Orleans to Baton Rouge and thence to the eastern terminus of the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, at Marshall, Tex. The grant was made upon the condition that the whole road should be completed within five years, and being made on the 3d of March, 1871, the time expired on the 3d of March, 1876.

In 1872 the State of Louisiana passed an act amendatory of the charter of the Backbone Railroad Company, by which they were authorized to construct a road northwesterly through the State so as to make this connection. But that act contained a proviso expressly declaring that the road from New Orleans to Baton Rouge should be on the east side of the Mississippi River.

The New Orleans, Baton Rouge, and Vicksburg Railroad Company never built one foot of that road within the time given it to earn the grant. They organized the company, issued the full amount of bonds and stock, and then dissolved. They did not keep up their organization, which the law required to be maintained in the city of New Orleans. They abandoned the whole road, its organization, and no one in the State of Louisiana ever heard of the company again until long after the grant had lapsed, and the matter was again revived by the efforts of what is known as the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, to obtain the grant. In 1875 the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company was organized under the corporation laws of the State of Louisiana, by which it received a roving commission to build a railroad in any part of the State of Louisiana. The charter of that company was indorsed by the Legislature in February, 1876, about fifteen days before the time expired within which the original Backbone road should have been completed.

The New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company located the line of their road substantially over the line of the Backbone road, except that they located their road on the west side of the Mississippi River up to Baton Rouge. From that point they run in the main on the line of the Backbone Railroad, not to the western terminus of the Texas Pacific road, but to Shreveport, a place forty miles distant from the western terminus of the Texas Pacific road. The New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company organized, raised a little money, and I think surveyed its route on as far as Marshall, Tex. They did some little grading, and then the company become involved in debt. They came here to Washington in 1878 or 1879, and had bills introduced into Congress, asking that the grant to the Backbone road be forfeited and transferred to them.

The first bill was introduced in 1877, and was referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads and never came out of that committee. The next bill was introduced in 1878, I think, and referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads. The committee ordered the bill to be reported and recommitted. It was reported and recommitted, but never came back into the House.

Again, in 1879 or 1880, my predecessor, Hon. E. W. Robertson, introduced the same bill for the third time, declaring the forfeiture of the grant to the Backbone Railroad Company and providing for its transfer to the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company. That bill went to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, but never came out of that committee into the House. So that this House has never yet, notwithstanding bills have been introduced, had an opportunity to act upon the subject. This was at the close of the Forty-sixth Congress.

In the mean time these gentlemen representing the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, finding that they could not secure favorable action from Congress—and it is so stated in the minority report of this committee—gave it up as a hopeless task. They then went to work negotiating with the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company for their grant. Determined to secure the grant at all hazards they opened negotiations with the stockholders of that defunct bankrupt concern.

They purchased from the New Orleans and Baton Rouge Company, or rather it is alleged that they purchased, this lapsed land grant. Mr. William H. Barnum, as the president of that company, and his son, as the secretary, professing to be authorized by the action of the board of directors of the company, situated in the city of New York—bear in mind that the legal domicile was in New Orleans—acting under that alleged authority, assumed to transfer this land grant to the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company. The transfer was made on the 5th day of January, 1881.

Finding, as matter of law, however, that the directors of a railroad company have not, by virtue of the functions of their office, the legal authority to dispose of its assets, they attempted to secure a ratification of that action of the directors by holding a meeting of the stockholders in the city of New Orleans. This they did through the means of proxies to the president of the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company. He held proxies from some nine stockholders of the Backbone Railroad Company.

He went to New Orleans, and with his proxies and a secretary, so far as the record shows, held a meeting. These proxies authorized him to vote at an election of directors of the Backbone company, and to do any other business that might come before them.

Acting under that proxy or that mandate the president of the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company at this meeting in New Orleans voted for a new board of directors for the Backbone Railroad Company, and then, going beyond the authority conferred by the power of attorney, attempted to ratify the sale which had been made by William H. Barnum and his son in the city of New York.

The claimant for this land is the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company under this transfer. The charter of the Backbone company was repealed in 1879 by an act of the Legislature of Louisiana. The Legislature investigated the matter, and ascertained that the corporation had not accomplished the object of its creation, had done nothing whatever toward building the road. There was a suit instituted—evidently a manufactured case—by which it is pretended the constitutionality of the repealing act was brought before the courts; and what is manifestly a consent decree was entered holding this act of the Legislature to be unconstitutional.

Now, the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, claiming to have purchased this land grant as I stated, and having abandoned the Halls of Congress where they had sought in vain to obtain from the grantor a transfer of the grant, then besieged the Interior Department. But before that—the moment the land grant was purchased—the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, in June, 1881, before this road was constructed, sold to the Texas and Pacific Railroad Company its franchises and its assets, and was consolidated with that road. That company has never owned a box-car since June, 1881. The sale was made to Mr. Jay Gould, representing the Texas Pacific Company. I may as well state here that in my opinion Mr. Jay Gould built this road without reference to the grant, and for the sole purpose of securing an outlet for his Southwestern system to the Gulf of Mexico.

The New Orleans Pacific Company in making this sale to Mr. Jay Gould reserved from the sale this land grant.

Mr. OATES. The gentleman does not pretend to say, I presume, that what he is now stating in regard to the sale of the New Orleans Pacific to Jay Gould is on the record.

Mr. LEWIS. I have a copy of the sale.

Mr. OATES. But the gentleman does not pretend that there is any such thing in the report in this case.

Mr. LEWIS. It is stated in the majority report.

Mr. OATES. If so, I do not know where it is.

Mr. LEWIS. The gentleman asks whether the fact I have stated in reference to the sale of the New Orleans Pacific road, with all its franchises, &c., to the Texas Pacific, is in the record. It is stated in the majority report, and I have with me as I said a copy of the sale. I know of my own personal knowledge that the New Orleans Pacific road, with all its franchises and assets except the grant, was, on the 20th June, 1881, sold to Mr. Jay Gould, and that company has not, so far as I know, owned anything connected with a railroad from that time to this. This road was built after that period, and as I believe by Jay Gould, yet that company, the New Orleans Pacific, is here now claiming this grant as the builders of that road.

But let me make one other statement. The grant made by Congress to this corporation created by the State of Louisiana recognizes in terms the existence of the charter granted by the State, because the language is that the grant is made to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, chartered by the State of Louisiana. I contend that the grant was made to that corporation with full knowledge of the location of the road, and with the intent to aid in accomplishing the purposes and objects of its creation by the State of Louisiana, that State having specifically required of this company that the road should be built on the east side of the Mississippi up to Baton Rouge. Congress, in making the grant, by clear implication, adopted that as the location of the line for the construction of that part of the road.

Mr. ELLIS. May I ask my colleague a question?

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly. I am ready to answer any question.

Mr. ELLIS. At the time of the grant of this land in 1871 had the Backbone company a charter that enabled it to go west of the Mississippi River?

Mr. LEWIS. I have said that the State of Louisiana gave it that authority in 1872.

Mr. ELLIS. After the land grant?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. TUCKER. To go west of the Mississippi River?

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly. I will state furthermore that the original charter of the Backbone Railroad Company authorized it to own and maintain roads going in almost any direction.

Mr. ELLIS. No; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. LEWIS. If the gentleman will examine closely the statute, especially the twenty-seventh section, I think he will find this company was authorized to own and maintain roads running in almost any direction.

Mr. ELLIS. Then why was a supplemental charter necessary?

Mr. LEWIS. The supplemental act, if I recollect aright, was passed in order to amend the original charter in some other respects.

In addition to the fact that this road was to have been built on the east side of the river, I wish to state that it is not completed, in point of fact, to the eastern terminus of the Texas Pacific Railroad. The law required the road to be built to Marshall, Tex. It is only built to Shreveport, forty miles distant. The answer given on this point by the minority of the committee is that by the act of Congress of 1871 or 1872 the Texas Pacific company was required to own, lease, or maintain a road from Marshall to Shreveport, and that the substantial purposes of the act were accomplished by running this New Orleans Pacific Railroad to Shreveport, inasmuch as a through line of travel was the object to be accomplished. I contend it was not at all necessary for the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company to go to Shreveport so far as the grant is concerned and assignee thereof. They were authorized to build to the State line in the northwestern part of the State of Louisiana, and had, as I said in the beginning, a roving commission to build a railroad anywhere it pleased in the State.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I desire to ask my colleague a question. Does not my colleague remember that the charter of the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company required that road to make Shreveport its northwestern terminus?

Mr. LEWIS. I do not recollect; but if that were the case it gave them no right to come in as assignee of the Backbone grant and plead that as an excuse for not complying with the conditions imposed in the granting act.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Is it not the fact that it was required to build a road to Shreveport?

Mr. LEWIS. I believe they were.

Mr. PAYSON. That is in the charter.

Mr. LEWIS. I do not know but that they were required to do so. But, sir, that has nothing to do with their fulfillment of the obligations and duties imposed by Congress, especially as they profess to stand in the shoes of the Backbone company as to the grant. It is that grant they are claiming, and it is as the assignee of that road they claim to have fulfilled and performed the conditions of the grant—in a word, to have built the road as the law required it to be built by the grantee; and whatever right their charter may have conferred on the New Orleans Pacific to go to Shreveport, whether it be a fact or not, it has nothing to do with this question.

In the arguments made by Judge Dillon in behalf of claimant before the committee he virtually took the position that the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company stood in the shoes of the Backbone Railroad Company. If it did, then it was bound by all those provisions of its charter and of the granting act in so far as those provisions fix the location and terminus of the road. The Backbone company could not build on the west side of the river, make Shreveport its terminus, and thereby earn the grant, and so neither can the New Orleans Pacific as assignee do so. Geographically speaking, it was not necessary at all for this company to go to Shreveport so far as this grant is concerned. To have gone directly to Marshall would have left Shreveport some distance northward. This will not be denied.

Mr. VAN EATON. Does not this road as now built and operated connect with the Texas Pacific and the rest of that system?

Mr. LEWIS. It does.

Mr. VAN EATON. That is all I want to know.

Mr. LEWIS. I think the gentleman knew that perfectly well without interrupting me to ask the question.

I desire to state briefly the positions taken by the Public Lands Committee, or at least a majority of them, on the law as applicable to the question of forfeiture. They are fully aware of the distinction between estates granted on conditions precedent and estates granted on conditions subsequent. They take the position where a public grant is concerned for the accomplishment of a public purpose made by statute that all of the conditions of the grant are to be strictly construed; that in case of doubt the Government under the law is entitled to the benefit of that doubt and against the grantee, and that the grantee should be held to a strict compliance with the conditions of the grant.

The Committee on Public Lands, following these principles in all cases where there was any doubt at all, has given the Government the benefit of that doubt. Take the case of the Oregon Central, where there was a question of the construction of a statute. Some members contended that the forfeiture could not legally cover the whole grant, but only that part contiguous to the road not constructed under the third section of the act, while others contended that under the sixth section the whole grant was forfeitable. If that part of the land lying contiguous to the constructed road had been left out of the forfeiture, conceding there was some doubt about the true construction of the act, Congress in passing such an act would by implication ratify the title to that part omitted, and when it went before the court the statute could be pleaded against any claim the Government might set up. The Government and people who are vitally interested in these matters should have the benefit of every advantage the law gives, and the Public Lands Committee has given the Government the benefit of the doubt in all cases, feeling satisfied whenever these questions go to the courts, as they must ultimately, the courts would resolve these doubts, and if we were in error they would correct them, and if we were not the Government would by this means recover its just dues.

I do not wish to talk any further on this subject now, but am perfectly willing before I resume my seat to answer any questions in regard to the bill which gentlemen may wish to ask.

Mr. VAN EATON. I understand the gentleman to say the committee had given the benefit of every doubt to the Government.

Mr. LEWIS. I said the majority of the committee, not you.

Mr. VAN EATON. Because it did not apply in this case.

Mr. LEWIS. I was only stating the position of the majority of the committee.

Mr. VAN EATON. You did not give the benefit of the doubt in this case for the simple reason that there was no doubt to give.

Mr. LEWIS. Before resuming my seat I desire to state further, Mr. Speaker, that the Committee on Public Lands have uniformly held that no railroad company under the law earns the grant except upon a strict compliance with the terms of the granting act; and where a time is fixed within which the road or a part of the road should be built, and within that time the road or no part of the road in compliance with the terms of the granting act had been built, the lands are justly forfeitable to the Government. Now, in the present case there was not a mile of this road built within the time fixed by the law, and the claimant company entered upon the construction of the road long after the time had elapsed within which it should have been built.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TOWNSHEND in the chair). Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Louisiana to relinquish the floor, reserving the remainder of his time?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir; I wish to reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. POLAND. Before the gentleman takes his seat I would like to be permitted to ask a question. I do not think I distinctly understood the gentleman, but the inference I drew from what he said was that this land grant was not conveyed to the existing railroad company there until after the road was built. Did the gentleman mean to state that?

Mr. LEWIS. No, sir; I did not say that. I said the land grant was conveyed to the claimant company before any road was built.

I will give the gentleman the dates, as near as I recollect them, as to these transactions. The transfer of the grant was made in January, 1881. In June, 1881, the claimant company, which was the assignee of the grant, sold out its road-bed, such as it was, its franchises, and its assets, &c. I said that the road was really constructed after that sale was made, and I claim that the New Orleans Pacific did not build the road at all, but that Jay Gould built it.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for a moment? He will not deny that the road was built under a contract made with the New Orleans Pacific road? He will concede that.

Mr. LEWIS. I will not concede that. I do not believe a word of it.

Mr. PAYSON. Well, of course, if the gentleman does not concede it——

Mr. ELLIS. Let me state that my colleague is further mistaken in saying that the road has been sold out, because the facts are directly to the contrary. It is owned and operated to-day by its own president and board of directors, and it has only been consolidated with another road for the convenience of passengers and traffic.

Mr. LEWIS. In regard to that matter I will state that I think I am perfectly well informed upon that point, and that my information in regard to this subject is that the New Orleans Pacific did sell its franchises, its road, its station-houses, and its rolling stock, and that it does not own even a single box-car. They reserved their simple, formal organization, to be dissolved whenever it suited their convenience, and preserved it only, in my judgment, until they could consummate the scheme they had devised to obtain the bonus in lands they are now seeking. They retained their organization as an intermediary through which Gould is to get the land. That is my opinion.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. Will the gentleman from Louisiana permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. I would like to ask the gentleman if he makes this statement of fact upon the findings of the committee, or whether it is merely the personal understanding of members of the committee?

Mr. LEWIS. On my own personal understanding and belief.

Mr. VAN EATON. But there is not a word in proof before the committee as to the last statement with reference to Gould.

Mr. COBB. That is of no consequence if it is before the committee as a matter of fact.

Mr. LEWIS. I stated it as my opinion and on my individual responsibility, and I will state it again, that in my judgment that organization was only retained to consummate this bargain through which the possession of the land is to revert to Jay Gould.

Mr. ELLIS. Does my colleague state that as a fact?

Mr. LEWIS. I state it as my own opinion, and that it is the conviction not only of myself, but of almost all of the people living along the line of the road in my section. I do not speak, of course, of your district, for I do not know anything of that, but of my own.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Let me ask my colleague is that the understanding of the people along the line of the road?

Mr. LEWIS. I have not so stated, but it seems that gentlemen are determined to misunderstand me.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I am sure my colleague does not think I wish to misunderstand him.

Mr. LEWIS. If my colleague had heard my statement, more than once repeated, you would see that I spoke of that part of the road lying within my district. I am not familiar with the feelings or opinions of those residing in other districts.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Or their understandings—

Mr. LEWIS. No, sir. I am now speaking of the road that runs through my district.

Mr. ELLIS. How much of it?

Mr. LEWIS. I can not recall the mileage; but I can give you the number of people, if you desire it, who have settled on these lands.

Mr. ELLIS. I did not expect to get the fact in reply to my question.

Mr. LEWIS. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has thirty-two minutes remaining.

Mr. LEWIS. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. OATES. The policy of granting lands to aid in the construction of railroads in this country began nearly thirty years ago, at a time when the public lands were used as a source of revenue; the price generally being $1.25 per acre. And the policy of making grants to aid in the construction of railroads was not a donation of the public domain, because it was upon the theory that the Government would lose nothing and would gain the advantages of increased commerce and population thereby. The policy was to give, to aid in the construction, alternate sections, and those reserved were doubled in price and sold by the Government at $2.50 per acre. The mere statement of the fact therefore shows that the policy of the Government was not to make donations, but that it was considered a wise and beneficent policy, because it developed the resources of the country and at the same time facilitated the sales of the public domain and added to the revenues of the Government.

This policy, however, a good policy in many respects, like many other good ones, was in the course of time abused. The Congress continued to enlarge the grants until the amount of the public domain devoted to the construction of railroads aggregated about 200,000,000 of acres.

The policy of the Government, however, in respect to the public lands has undergone a change, and they are now held not so much as a source of revenue but are given to actual settlers as homesteads. Nevertheless along the lines within the limits of these grants, I believe without exception, the Government still requires the payment of the advanced price. Therefore when we apply the principle to the grant now under consideration the Government of the United States has parted in fact with nothing. While it is true that about 900,000 or a million acres of land are claimed under this act by this railroad company, an equal amount which was reserved by the Government has been or is to be sold at the advanced price of $2.50 per acre.

The questions presented, in my humble judgment, are business propositions, and should be acted upon by Congress as such; not as political questions, but as great business propositions. Now, what are these? I take it that every member of this House is in favor of forfeiting and returning to the public domain all of the grants to railroad corporations which ought to be forfeited and returned; and, on the other hand, that every one is opposed to a forfeiture where no forfeiture ought to be made.

But the question arises as to what ought or ought not to be forfeited. This depends upon every gentleman's judgment when he comes to apply the law to the facts of the particular case in hand. There are some questions connected with this grant which are admitted, and therefore it is unnecessary to consume time in the argumentation of them.

What is known as the Backbone railroad corporation was one chartered by the Legislature of Louisiana in 1869. It was authorized to construct a road from the city of New Orleans, on the east side of the Mississippi River, to Vicksburg, in the State of Mississippi. Any gentleman who will look at the map will see that to pursue a direct line would very soon after leaving the city of New Orleans cause the road to depart widely from the river. The same charter authorized the company to construct a branch road from the main trunk line to Baton Rouge. Thus it stood when Congress in the twenty-second section of the act of the 3d of March, 1871, known as the Texas Pacific grant, made a grant for the construction of the road which we are now considering. I will ask the Clerk to read that section.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, chartered by the State of Louisiana, shall have the right to connect, by the most eligible route, to be selected by said company, with the said Texas Pacific Railroad at its eastern terminus, and shall have the right of way through the public land to the same extent granted hereby to the said Texas Pacific Railroad Company; and in aid of its construction from New Orleans to Baton Rouge, thence by way of Alexandria, in said State, to connect with said Texas Pacific Railroad Company at its eastern terminus, there is hereby granted to said company, its successors and assigns, the same number of alternate sections of public land per mile in the State of Louisiana as are by this act granted in the State of California to said Texas Pacific Railroad Company; and said lands shall be withdrawn from market, selected, and patents issued therefor, and open for settlement and preemption upon the same terms and in the same manner and time as is provided for and required from said Texas Pacific Railroad Company within said State of California: Provided, That said company shall complete the whole of said road within five years from the passage of this act.

Mr. OATES. It will be seen that this grant is made to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company. That corporation was given—

The right to connect—

Mark the language—

by the most eligible routes, to be selected by said company, with the said Texas Pacific Railroad at its eastern terminus, and shall have the right of way, &c.

Now, after this grant was made the maps of location were filed in the General Land Office, and nothing more was done toward the construction of that road by that company.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. OATES. Yes, sir.

Mr. LEWIS. Are you aware the maps filed in the Interior Department by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company located that railroad?

Mr. OATES. I am perfectly aware of that. That was what was done. The company did nothing more. At last, in the early part of 1876, the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, which now claims this grant, was chartered by a notary under the general law. Then, in 1876, before the five years' limit mentioned in this twenty-second section expired, the Legislature, amending that notarial charter, authorized the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company to construct a road from New Orleans, by Baton Rouge, westward to Dallas, or other points westward in Texas.

The purpose of the Legislature in amending this notarial charter manifestly was to enable the company, if the Backbone company did not do so, to construct a road so as to connect with the Texas Pacific system. The difficulty evidently occurred to the Legislature of Louisiana afterward that the New Orleans Pacific Railroad could not build over the line of the Backbone road so long as the grant to that road remained, because, the maps of location having been filed in the General Land Office, the lands on either side of the route had been withdrawn, and the New Orleans Pacific Railroad could not build without going over the grant already made.

Therefore, for the purpose of enabling the company to do so, soon afterward—in April, 1871, I believe it was—the Legislature of Louisiana passed an act repealing the charter of the Backbone company. That company had proved itself a do-nothing company; it had issued its bonds but had constructed no road, and the time had elapsed for constructing the road, as specified in section 22 of the granting act. The purpose of Congress in making this grant, it is patent, was to secure a connection between New Orleans and the Mississippi River with the Texas Pacific system. The language used in the grant authorizes the company to construct a road "over such route as it shall designate touching the points named," Baton Rouge and Alexandria, to connect with the Texas Pacific system, or at its eastern terminus. The language of the act is not, as the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LEWIS] employed in his remarks, to build a road to Marshall, Tex.

Mr. LEWIS. Read the whole of the section.

Mr. OATES. It is "to connect by the most eligible route, to be selected by said company, with the said Texas Pacific Railroad at its eastern terminus." Subsequently, in 1872 or 1873 I believe, an act was passed in relation to the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, changing its name, authorizing it to issue bonds, and to either build a road or to form running connections from its eastern terminus, as fixed by the original act, to Shreveport, in Louisiana. Therefore, while Marshall, Tex., remained in law the eastern terminus, and the office of the company was kept there, in fact by this subsequent enactment the company was authorized and required to extend its eastern terminus to Shreveport, in Louisiana, and they did so.

The eastern terminus of the road, or where it has its office, is in law at Marshall, Tex., but in fact it is at Shreveport, La. Mark you, this act was passed before the amendatory act of the Legislature of Louisiana of December 11, 1872. Up to that date the Backbone company had no charter from the State authorizing it to go to Shreveport or to any point on the west side of the Mississippi. When this grant was made the Backbone company had no charter to operate on the western side of the Mississippi River.

The grant made by Congress was for the construction of a road from New Orleans, by Baton Rouge and Alexandria, to connect with the eastern terminus of the Texas Pacific system. Here was a right of way given by Congress in the grant.

Subsequently, December 11, 1872, in order to enable the Backbone company to avail itself of this grant, the Legislature of Louisiana amended the charter, and authorized it to construct a road to Baton Rouge by the way of Alexandria and Shreveport; not to the eastern terminus of the Texas Pacific Railroad, but to Shreveport.

Mr. LEWIS. My friend is mistaken.

Mr. OATES. No, I am not; or, if I am, the gentleman has time reserved in which he can answer me.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] to yield to me that I may move that the House shall take a recess at 5 o'clock to reassemble at 8 o'clock, and to ask unanimous consent that the session of this evening shall be for the consideration of business reported from the Committee on Military Affairs and Senate bills on the Speaker's table the subject-matter of which has been considered by that committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. ROSECRANS]?

Mr. CRISP. I object.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Then I will make the motion that the House now take a recess until 8 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion for a recess.

Mr. ROSECRANS. And I ask unanimous consent that upon reassembling the House shall proceed to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Military Affairs and Senate bills on the Speaker's table the subject-matter of which has been considered by that committee.

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. If the House shall now take a recess until 8 o'clock and there is not unanimous consent as asked by the gentleman from California [Mr. ROSECRANS], will we not have to go on with the ordinary business of the House this evening?

The SPEAKER. The House will go on with its usual regular business.

Mr. THOMPSON. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. OATES. I will yield for a motion to adjourn, retaining my right to the floor when the consideration of the pending bill shall be resumed.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. CHALMERS. I ask consent to have printed in the RECORD, as a portion of the debate of this House, some remarks prepared by me on the subject of the tariff.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. That is not necessary, for general leave to print has already been given by the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there has been a general order to that effect. But the leave will be granted, as requested by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS], if there is no objection.

There was no objection, and leave was granted accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. ROSECRANS] asks unanimous consent that there be a session this evening, commencing at 8 o'clock, and that the House shall then consider business reported from the Committee on Military Affairs and Senate bills on the Speaker's table the subject-matter of which has been considered by that committee. Is there objection?

Mr. CRISP. I object. There is no quorum of members in attendance at evening sessions.

Mr. THOMPSON. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] that this House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BOYLE: Petition of Union soldiers and sailors for the passage of certain pension laws—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BRECKINRIDGE: Petition of citizens of Hot Springs Ark., to confirm awards to property at said place—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. DIBBLE: Petition of the Bricklayers' Union, No. 1, of Charleston, S. C., in favor of the bill to prohibit the importation of aliens under contract to perform labor in the United States—to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. HARMER: Petition of members of the Grand Army of the Republic, asking for an appropriation to establish a national cemetery near Philadelphia, Pa.—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. LYMAN: Petition of citizens of Clinton, Mass., against a Government postal telegraph—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 26, 1884.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will come to order.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum and move a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It being suggested that there is no quorum present, the roll will be called.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and thirty-three Senators answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The names of the absentees will be called.

The CHIEF CLERK. Messrs. Aldrich, Anthony, Bayard, Beck, Blair, Bowen, Butler, Camden, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Coke, Colquitt, Cullom, Dolph, Fair, Farley, Garland, George, Gibson, Gorman, Groome, Hoar, Ingalls, Jackson, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kenna, Lamar, Lapham, Logan, McPherson, Mahone, Manderson, Miller of New York, Palmer, Riddleberger, Sabin, Saulsbury, Sewell, Sherman, Van Wyck, Voorhees, Walker, and Williams—43.

Subsequently, Mr. GARLAND, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. INGALLS, Mr. CAMERON of Pennsylvania, Mr. FAIR, and Mr. LOGAN entered the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-nine Senators are present, constituting a quorum. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings will be read.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of J. H. R. Storey, treasurer of the United States Maimed Soldiers' League of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the passage of Senate bill 2315, granting pensions to maimed soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of W. Mandeville, late a sharpshooter in Company E, First Pennsylvania Rifles, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Francis Story, of Haverhill, Scioto County, Ohio, late private Battery L, First Ohio Light Artillery, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I present a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Saint Paul, Minn., in favor of an additional appropriation for the quartermaster's department building in that city. In this connection I submit an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which I move be referred, with the petition, to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY presented the petition of Capt. H. C. Cook and 11 other officers of the Second United States Infantry, praying for the passage of House bill No. 3117, to reorganize the infantry regiments of the United States Army, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of T. B. Adams and 17 other lieutenants of artillery of the United States Army, praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 1677 removing discriminations between lieutenants of the line and lieutenants of the staff; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PENDLETON presented a memorial of the John Shillito Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of what is known as the Culberson bill, relative to the jurisdiction of Federal courts; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Lemert Post, No. 71, Department of Ohio, Grand Army of the Republic, Newark, Ohio, favoring the passage of what is known as the Lovering House bill, No. 6463, in regard to pensions; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1977) for the relief of Maria L. Hammer, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2017) granting a pension to Walter Dickson, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6529) for the relief of John Kane, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2378) restoring to the pension-roll the name of John Allee, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report to the Senate a document sent to the committee by the War Department from the board of engineers appointed by the Department to examine and report upon the construction of bridges across the Great Kanawha River, in West Virginia. I move that the report be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 2447) for the relief of Catherine Terry;

A bill (H. R. 2660) granting a pension to William Printz;

A bill (H. R. 2425) granting a pension to Catharine Henry;

A bill (H. R. 1897) granting a pension to Catherine Hunter; and

A bill (H. R. 2536) granting a pension to Michael Mack.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2049) granting a pension to James King, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FAIR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 3) for the relief of the widow and children of John W. Judson, late agent of the United States at Oswego, N. Y., for public works on Lake Ontario, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SLATER. On the 27th of May last I was instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to report back the bill (S. 2036) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes, and asked leave at the time to file subsequently the report of the committee. I now submit the report, and move that it be printed and recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1646) to further continue the act to authorize the settlement of the accounts of officers of the Army and Navy, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

REPORT ON FISH AND FISHERIES.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a concurrent resolution to print the report of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, to report it favorably, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries for the year 1884 be printed, and that there be printed 10,000 extra copies, of which 2,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 6,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,500 for the use of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, and 500 for sale by the Public Printer under such regulations as the Joint Committee on Printing may prescribe, at a price equal to the additional cost of publication and 10 per cent. thereto thereon added, the illustrations to be obtained by the Public Printer under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

Mr. COCKRELL. Are there any amendments reported?

Mr. HAWLEY. No amendments. The committee report the resolution in accordance with the practice heretofore, expecting an amendment from the Senator from Missouri, if he choses to offer it. If the Senator is not satisfied with the number of 2,000, as proposed, he can move an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to strike out "3,000" and insert "2,500," and to reduce the "6,000" to "5,000" for the House. That will give 2,500 to the Senate and 5,000 to the House. I wish the Committee on Printing would adopt that rule and report the amendments to save the trouble of always having to move and adopt them in the Senate. I think it is a fair and just distribution, and the Senate has sustained it so often that it ought to become a rule of action.

Mr. HAWLEY. I confess that in this particular case we followed the precedent without stopping to think of the rule that the Senator from Missouri desires to establish; but I suggest to him that where the Senate has been for a long series of years accustomed to a certain distribution, and has made no complaint, we do not feel quite justified in proposing an additional number. We can hardly expect the other House to consent to a reduction of its number, the House having added thirty-two to its total membership. Therefore, we have followed the precedent.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then I move to add to the amount allowed to the Senate, so as to make it 3,000. This is a valuable document, and there are a great many applications for it. Instead of 2,000 for the Senate, I move to make the number 3,000 for the Senate. That will leave the House with the present number, and give the Senate one-half.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 5 it is proposed to strike out "10,000" and insert "11,000;" and in the same line to strike out "2,000" and insert "3,000;" so as to read:

And that there be printed 11,000 extra copies; of which 3,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 6,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. INGALLS. I never have been able to see any reason for the difference in the number of copies of works ordered by Congress that are assigned to the Senate and the House of Representatives. I can not understand why the Senate is not entitled to precisely the same number that is ordered for the House. It is not a question of numerical membership. The two Senators from the State of Connecticut represent exactly as many people as the four Representatives from that State. There is no just reason and no propriety, as I understand, in the difference which has hitherto been made. I believe that under previous regulations the Senate has received one-third the number assigned to the House. The Senator from Connecticut can probably inform me.

Mr. HAWLEY. It varies with different documents. That is approximately correct.

Mr. INGALLS. I should be glad if the Committee on Printing would assert what I believe to be the privilege and prerogative of this body. We represent exactly the same number of people with our number of seventy-six that is represented by the three hundred and twenty-five members of the House of Representatives, and with regard to all valuable publications we are entitled to precisely the same number.

Of course I do not expect to have that idea enforced in this resolution, but it seemed an appropriate place to make the observation that no reason has been shown why the difference should continue to exist, and to express the hope that the committee will take the matter into consideration.

Mr. HAWLEY. The pending resolution, as proposed to be amended on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, gives the Senators about forty copies apiece of this valuable report, and it gives the Members of the House less than twenty each. It is true that two Senators represent a whole State, yet it is also true that many of the local wants and many of the local libraries are supplied by the members. The proposition of the Senator from Kansas would introduce a new usage, one that has never appeared to be necessary for the public business, and would also lead to a very heavy increase of the appropriation for public printing. The Committee on Public Printing have endeavored to restrain the extraordinary disposition of the American people to print.

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator will pardon me for a single suggestion, I do not see how it could increase the expenditure for public printing if the numbers of documents were equally divided.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the Senator proposes not to increase the total number but to simply divide by two——

Mr. INGALLS. I propose to change the distribution.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is not proper to speak of what the other House have done, though it might be proper to conjecture what they might do. We should find that utterly impossible. However, if the Senator does not propose to apply his suggestion to the pending resolution I shall say no more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ALLEGED OUTRAGES AT DANVILLE, VA.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 95) for the printing of extra copies of the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in regard to alleged outrages in Danville, Va., report the same favorably without any recommendation as to the number of copies. The resolution provides for 150,000 copies of the majority and minority reports, the cost of which would be $109,200. As the committee stands at present, it makes no recommendation as to the number, but reports in favor of the resolution generally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire to have the joint resolution considered now?

Mr. HAWLEY. I believe the resolution concerning Copiah County went to the Calendar. This may take the same course. It can be called up hereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 2343) relative to the retirement of mates in the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying memorial, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. JONAS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2344) appropriating money for the establishment of a Government farm at or near the thirty-first parallel of north latitude; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. ALLISON introduced a bill (S. 2345) granting a pension to E. W. Nagle; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

JAMES COFFEY.

Mr. MITCHELL. In the case of the bill (S. 513) granting a pension to James Coffey, of Oregon, I ask that the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed be reconsidered by unanimous consent and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions. A mistake was made in the case, and we wish to correct it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to have the vote heretofore taken in the Senate indefinitely postponing the bill named by him reconsidered and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HELEN M. HARRISON.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask that the bill (H. R. 2325) granting a pension to Helen M. Harrison be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions. An adverse report was made upon the bill by the Senate committee. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] made the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the bill named by him be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

DEBATE ON APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "Concurrent or other resolutions" are in order; and the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution offered yesterday by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That during the remainder of the present session of the Senate it shall be in order to move at any time that debate on any amendment, or all amendments, to any appropriation bill then before the Senate be limited to five minutes for each Senator, and that no Senator shall speak more than once on the same amendment in form or substance. The question on such motion shall be determined without debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Does the resolution apply to the pending appropriation bill or to all such bills?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If adopted it will apply to the pending bills; but it is not a resolution which operates upon the bill itself. It only makes it in order to move a limit to debate.

Mr. MORGAN. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that he increase the time to ten minutes. I believe it would be economy of time to allow Senators to speak ten minutes instead of five, and it would prevent a resort to the fashion we have here of moving to strike out the last word, and the like of that, in order to keep the floor to complete remarks that Senators want to make.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state to the Senator from Alabama that the five-minute rule is usual. It has prevailed in the Senate, I think, for many years on appropriation bills, and has been found to be quite convenient. It is never enforced, the Senator will remember, unless it is absolutely necessary to save time and get along with the work. It requires a majority of the Senate to agree to it on any amendment or any bill. I do not think there is any abuse liable to occur under it.

Mr. MORGAN. There are a great many very important questions on the pending bill; and the sundry civil bill is coming up. The sundry civil bill, as we know, was passed without any discussion in the other House. I am informed by some Senators upon the Committee on Appropriations that there is likely to be a good deal of change in the deficiency bill. I think that a ten-minute rule is a very much more economical one than a five-minute rule. Some Senators do not like to transgress upon such a rule, but others are not quite so tender-footed about it. I believe that if we gave a Senator ten minutes that would be ample time, and it would be more satisfactory.

Such a rule, it is true, has been acted upon sometimes in the Senate when under great pressure for want of time, but it has been most frequently—

More honored in the breach than the observance.

Senators run over the time, ask unanimous consent to proceed, and get embarrassed in their remarks by the fact that they are confronted with a five-minute limitation upon debate. The Senate gets into the habit of going rather slow anyway, pretty much at its leisure, and it is not quite the thing to bring us up to a rapid gait all at once.

Mr. ALLISON. I think we had better adhere to the established rule.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not. I think ten minutes is right, and I move to amend by striking out "five" and inserting "ten," before the word "minutes."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 4, it is proposed to strike out the word "five" and insert "ten;" so as to read:

That debate on any amendment, or all amendments, to any appropriation bill then before the Senate be limited to ten minutes for each Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Iowa suggests that probably the resolution had better be adhered to in the terms presented by him, and intimates that it never is very rigidly enforced. I should be inclined to suspect that if the present occupant of the chair happened to be presiding, the probabilities are that there would not be a great deal of latitude permitted in case the rule should be adopted. And in my judgment, considering the present condition of the public business, this is a pretty drastic provision. I understand, although I have not yet had the opportunity of examination, that very important and radical changes in existing laws have been made in the bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government. If they are what they are reported to be, I judge that they will be strenuously resisted. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that in case a debate of that kind is provoked, as seems to be probable, the operations of this rule might be very embarrassing; and I should regret to see it adopted at this stage of the session.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me, certainly if we are to take into consideration the radical legislation on the sundry civil bill the majority of the Senate would never agree to the application of the rule. I for one would never move it on a debate of that importance. Of course this rule will not apply, the Senator knows very well, until a majority of the Senate agrees to it.

Mr. INGALLS. If the rule is not to apply, why should it be adopted?

Mr. ALLISON. As the rules now are, it is impossible to move to limit debate to five minutes. This only makes it possible. Of course on those occasions the debate will have to be limited by a vote of the Senate and by a majority of the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. I have never seen any abuse of the usual privileges of debate that are allowed in this body. I think it conducive to the welfare of the public service that there should be here a free and untrammeled expression of opinion upon matters of public import. I am very sure that every Senator feels the importance of the due transaction of the public business and the dignity of his station sufficiently to render it very certain that he will not infringe upon what is necessary or appropriate.

In view of what is likely to occur, as I said before, I think the application of the rule at this time is very unwise.

Mr. HARRIS. This resolution only makes it in order for a Senator to move to limit debate upon amendments. I think there is economy of time in the adoption of such a resolution. I am confident that no harm can result from it, because I am sure that no Senator in charge of a bill would move to limit debate until at least a reasonable time and a fair opportunity for debate upon every important question had been had; and if the motion is made, it is within the power of a majority of the Senate to decline to adopt it until full and sufficient debate has been had upon pending questions.

Mr. BAYARD. Or to discontinue it.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course. A majority of the Senate can adopt it or a majority of the Senate may discontinue it even if the resolution shall be passed. I see no possible harm that can result from it, and I hope the resolution as offered by the Senator from Iowa may be adopted.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I only desire to say that when the resolution was offered yesterday by the Senator from Iowa at the close of the somewhat extended remarks I had made, I thought it was to limit debate to five minutes absolutely, and therefore I objected, thinking that there might be questions coming up that would require more than five minutes' debate on some of the appropriation bills; but after looking at it this morning, and observing that it only makes it in order to move that that shall be done at any time, either on a whole bill or on an amendment to it, if a majority of the Senate should think time was being wasted by myself or others, I regard it is very well to have that in the power of the Senate. I think the resolution ought to be adopted. It makes no difference as to the time; the Senate can always suspend it at any moment they think it necessary, and five minutes is about as much as in ordinary debate I care about.

Mr. MORGAN. I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that we can not amend it after it is an established rule of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. We can suspend it.

Mr. MORGAN. It can not be suspended except by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that it will be in order to move to reconsider the vote by which debate was limited on any question.

Mr. MORGAN. That would be in order, perhaps. Of course when the Senator from Iowa gets up and moves a limit to debate on a certain bill, or a certain feature of a bill, to five minutes, then it is a question for debate whether we shall do it or not, and perhaps we shall consume half the day in debating the motion. That is no economy of time.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will see that a Senator in charge of a bill would never make the motion if he thought it was likely to be debated, because that would be a waste of time.

Mr. MORGAN. Then what is the use of the rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will see by reading the rssolution of the Senator from Iowa that the motion to limit debate is not a debatable motion.

Mr. MORGAN. I think an amendment allowing ten minutes will get rid of the difficulty. I should be willing to vote for the resolution in that form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama, to strike out "five" and insert "ten."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the words "or all amendments." Under this resolution, when a particular amendment is under discussion a motion is made to limit debate on that particular amendment, or it may be an extended motion to limit debate on all amendments, some of which may not have been considered at all. I think it sufficient to give to any member an opportunity to move that debate on a particular amendment shall be limited to five minutes, but not to give the power upon the first amendment that comes up to move that debate on all amendments that may be offered to a bill shall be limited to five minutes. I move to strike out the words "or all amendments," in the third line.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING OF PENSION BILL.

On motion of Mr. MITCHELL, it was Ordered, That the bill (H. R. 5667) granting pensions to soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes, be printed, as amended by the Senate, for the use of the Senate.

ROBERT BUTLER.

Mr. BUTLER submitted the following resolution; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to place on record in the War Department the order of President Jackson of March 3, 1837, canceling the commission conferring the rank of lieutenant-colonel by brevet on Robert Butler, adjutant-general, dated July 1, 1815.

TRANSPORTATION OF DUTIABLE GOODS.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent now to consider the bill on the table which came from the House yesterday merely making an alteration in the statutes of 1880 to allow dutiable goods to be transported both by land and water. Many of the ports in the western part of our country find that they can get transportation much cheaper if they have it partly by railroad and partly by water. This bill that comes from the House is identical in all its parts with a bill reported from the Committee on Finance which allows this to be done, and the only alteration in the existing law is, "or where the route is bonded for both land and water carriage," in the first section, and in the second section merely making provision so that it can be carried out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent to have taken from the table and now considered the bill indicated by him.

Mr. ALLISON. I will not object in this particular instance unless it leads to debate.

Mr. MORRILL. There will be no debate about it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6215) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I move now to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7069) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator indulge me a moment? I desire to submit a report from a committee of conference.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the appropriation bill be first taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to submit the report of the committee of conference appointed on the bill (H. R. 3961) to grant to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes. I ask that the report be considered now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia presents a report of the conference between the two Houses on House bill 3961. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3961) to grant the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with the following amendment, namely: In lieu of the Senate amendment insert the following: "The line to be located in sections of twenty-five miles each, and before work is begun on any section the line thereof is to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered respectively 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with the following amendment, namely: Amend the Senate amendment by inserting after the word "construction" the word "operation," and adding after the word "Interior" the words "in accordance with said intercourse laws;" and the Senate agree to the same.

JOSEPH E. BROWN,
PHILETUS SAWYER,
J. R. HAWLEY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

OLIN WELLBORN,
RICE A. PIERCE,
B. W. PERKINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the report.

Mr. HARRISON. I make no objection to the report of the committee of conference except as to the last suggestion. The language used in the Senate amendment, which I had the honor to offer, is exactly and literally the language of our treaty with those nations. The treaty provides that any operative who may be brought into the Territory in connection with the construction or use of railroads shall there be subject to the Indian intercourse acts and to such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior. That is an explicit treaty stipulation. If we, as the representatives of the United States acting here as a Senate, mean to abide by our obligations deliberately entered into for a consideration; if we do not mean to put ourselves in the attitude of truce-breakers, and to proclaim that we have no regard for a treaty when made with a nation or power that is unable to enforce its treaty obligations against us, then we ought to disagree to the conference report in that respect. The language of the amendment as adopted by the Senate was exactly the language of our treaty. I copied it from our treaty of 1866 with these Indians; and the limitation is to restrict the power of the Secretary of the Interior to make rules with reference to this matter to the Indian intercourse acts. That is the effect of it. He may make regulations touching all the matters that are governed by the intercourse acts, but it limits his power over these, whereas we expressly stipulated in the treaty that he might make other rules and regulations.

We are brought then to the square test whether as Senators we desire or are willing, in the interest of a railroad corporation, to deliberately walk over our treaty stipulations in the premises.

Mr. BROWN. The same argument has been submitted over and over again as an objection to the granting of any charter to any railroad company through the Indian Territory, that it is a violation of the treaty with the Indians. A similar question went before the Supreme Court of the United States some years ago when we enforced the internal-revenue laws in the Indian Territory, and it was claimed that we were violating our treaty. The Supreme Court of the United States said it was true that the act of Congress in reference to the internal revenue and the treaty could not stand together, and that the treaty must yield.

Probably all this railroad legislation may be in violation of treaties, if you use the strongest term and call it a violation; but there is no question whatever about the power of the Government and the right of the Government, if the Indians do not possess the sovereignty of that Territory, to make such rules and regulations and enact such laws as it may think proper from time to time on these subjects even without regard to the treaties. If we take the property of a citizen in one of the States as a right of way for a railroad we violate the express grant that was made by the State to the citizen; we take from him property that had been guaranteed to him forever. We can only do it by paying him just compensation. The Government of the United States has exactly the same right by paying just compensation to the Indians to take any property that they have within the Indian Territory, and it is no more a violation of the treaty in that case than it is a violation of the grant in the other case.

If we are to have railroads across that Territory we shall be obliged to enact certain laws that do not exactly conform to the treaties heretofore made. What we are doing is doing the Indians no injustice certainly, because we are paying them very liberal compensation for all we take from them. I presume it will hardly be contended successfully in this Congress in future, or in any other Congress, that the Indians can sit down in that Territory, a small number as they are, and deny to the people of the United States the right to build railroads and conduct transportation across it from one part of the Union to another. Their rights will have to be held there subordinate to the general rights of the whole people and to the legislation of Congress. In all cases, however, we should be very careful to do them full and ample justice. We have done so in the case of this railroad charter. We provide for paying them $50 per mile, and if we capitalize the $15 per mile per annum we are to pay them hereafter, we pay them about $24 an acre for the land we take. The land would not bring a dollar and a half an acre, as it lies there now. I think we have dealt very generously and very justly with them.

Now, if all the employés and everybody connected with the running of this railroad are to be under local regulations of the Indians, or under such regulations as the Secretary of the Interior might prescribe, outside of the regular rules and regulations or outside of the intercourse laws, then it seems to me the railroad authorities would be very much embarrassed, and if on a former occasion we have embarrassed one company in that way I do not think it is wise or proper that we should embarrass another. If we permit railroad companies to run lines of road across the Territory, we should give them all the real authority that is necessary, we should find places on the right of way as we do in this case for their operatives and employés to live and transact the business.

It seems to me that there is really no more solid objection to this than there is to the whole measure, and the Senate has already determined upon that.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I confess to some surprise to hear the Senator from Georgia say that we must walk deliberately and with open eyes over a solemn treaty compact with these Indians for fear we may embarrass a railroad company.

Mr. BROWN. No; that was not my statement. I stated that we could not conduct transportation across the Territory without having the necessary privileges there for our employés.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Georgia said just what I remarked, that this would result in embarrassment to the railroad company, and he did not controvert my proposition that it was an express treaty stipulation.

Mr. BROWN. That was said in connection with other matters, but it was not all I said.

Mr. HARRISON. It was not all he said, but it was the gist and substance of the argument, and all the argument that has been made upon this proposition.

Now, I want to read to the Senate our treaty stipulation with these people upon this subject to show that the amendment I offered was in the exact terms of our treaty, and then I want to see who there is among us here that is willing to walk open-eyed over that obligation for fear he may embarrass a railroad company. After providing that railroads may be constructed through the Territory we have this stipulation in the treaty of 1866:

But such railroad company, or companies, with all its or their agents or employés, shall be subject to the laws of the United States relating to intercourse with Indian tribes, and also to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior for that purpose.

I do not care to argue this further.

Mr. HAWLEY. The amendment to the House bill offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] was in these words:

The officers, servants, and employés of said company necessary to the construction—

The conference committee here inserted the word "operation," to which the Senator makes no objection. So I will read it so—

The officers, servants, and employés of said company necessary to the construction, operation, and management of said railroad and telegraph and telephone lines shall be allowed to reside, while so engaged, upon said right of way, but subject to the provisions of the Indian intercourse laws and such rules and regulations as may be established by the Secretary of the Interior.

The Senator from Indiana himself in moving this amendment made no reference therein to the treaty obligations, which I suppose he took for granted were binding, as I did, so that it was not necessary to refer to that; and the conference committee added that rules and regulations may be established by the Secretary of the Interior in accordance with the Indian intercourse laws. I take it that does not bar the Secretary of the Interior from continuing the performance of the duty that is now resting upon him to lay down for those employés also any obligations they may be under under the treaties with the Indians. I think he is not barred from enforcing the treaties because he is authorized to lay down regulations in accordance with the intercourse laws.

Mr. HARRISON. I think there is just where the Senator's mistake is, as in the case referred to by the Senator from Georgia. We had a treaty stipulation which was violated in its letter, and in its spirit too, perhaps, by our internal-revenue laws; yet the law was as high obligation as the treaty, and being the later expression of the legislative will, it controlled, and the Supreme Court decided that the treaty had no sanction which was superior to that legislation. So I think it would be here.

Mr. HAWLEY. If I thought there was any doubt, being as anxious to abide by these treaties as the Senator from Indiana, and having indicated that anxiety in a previous debate, I would add this:

And the treaties with said Indians.

If the Senator desires to make that amendment I will support it. I was upon this conference committee, and assented to the amendment proposed because I thought it expressed what the Senator from Indiana desired.

Mr. HARRISON. If the words the Senator from Connecticut suggests are inserted there, they certainly would give the Secretary authority to enforce our treaty stipulations as part of this legislation.

Mr. HAWLEY. It would not interfere, in my opinion, with the claim made by the Senator from Georgia, which is a claim I do not assent to, that we have a right to override these treaties entirely. I do not think it would interfere with any purpose he has intimated to us, but it would remove the objection made by the Senator from Indiana, and if there be any legal force in his objection I concur with him. I would not have agreed to the conference report if I supposed that was its construction.

Mr. INGALLS. The report of a conference committee can not be amended.

Mr. HAWLEY. It can go to another conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Chair will state to the Senator from Connecticut that the only method is to disagree to the report.

Mr. HAWLEY. I agree to that on reflection. If there be any doubt, if the Senator from Indiana thinks there is any doubt, as to the construction of this matter I hope he will oppose the acceptance of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate concur in the report of the committee of conference?

The report was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 81) for the relief of Benjamin F. Pope;

A bill (S. 1721) for a bridge across the Missouri river at White Cloud, in Doniphan County, Kansas; and

A bill (S. 1861) for the relief of the Atlantic Alcohol Company, of Atlantic, State of Iowa.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 2344) for the relief of Melissa G. Polar;

A bill (H. R. 2722) for the relief of Martha Turner; and

A bill (H. R. 6082) authorizing the payment by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to Charles H. Getman, the firm of E. W. Rathbun & Co., the firm of Kenyon, Wright & Co., the firm of Bond & Jenkins, and the firm of Page, Fairchild & Co. certain duties paid by them on imported lumber accidentally burned while in custody of officers of customs and before the same had entered into consumption.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I call for the regular order.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 7069) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations to strike out from line 960 to line 978 the following words:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall exempt all distilleries which mash ten bushels of grain or less per day from the operation of the provisions of title 35 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to payment of the tax; and said distilleries shall be run and operated without storekeepers; and said Secretary may exempt any distillery or all distilleries which mash twenty-five bushels of grain per day from the operation of the provisions of said title relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to the payment of the tax; and any distillery so exempted shall be run as fruit distilleries are now operated: Provided, That special warehouses may be established by the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he may cause to be deposited the product of any number of said distilleries, to be designated by him by his order, and in which any of said distillers may deposit his product, and when so deposited shall be subject to all the laws and regulations as to bonds, tax, removal, and otherwise as is now provided by law for other warehouses.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

And section 3261 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended, so as to read as follows:

"No collector shall approve the bond of any distiller until all the requirements of the law, and all regulations made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in relation to distilleries in pursuance thereof, have been complied with; nor shall the collector hereafter approve any bond of a grain distiller the survey of whose distillery shall be for a less capacity than ten bushels of grain per day; nor shall the survey of any grain distillery be made for a less capacity than ten bushels of grain per day; nor shall the per diem capacity of any grain distillery be reduced below ten bushels. Every collector who violates this provision shall forfeit and pay $2,000 and be dismissed from office; and every distiller of grain who, after the 1st day of November, 1884, operates his distillery on a less capacity than ten bushels of grain per day shall be liable to the fines, forfeitures, and imprisonment specified in section 3260 of the Revised Statutes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the pending amendment the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I do not think this amendment ought to prevail. It seems to me the bill as it came from the House of Representatives contains what it ought to contain on this question. From the earliest period of the Government there has been difficulty on this question of internal revenue and whisky taxation. During the administration of General Washington there was an internal-revenue law something like this, imposing a tax upon whisky, which caused a rebellion in the State of Pennsylvania, and caused the Father of his Country at the head of an army to have to go there for its suppression.

In Mr. Jefferson's time it was entirely abolished, and he congratulated the country in his second inaugural address in this language:

The suppression of unnecessary offices, of useless establishments and expenses, enabled us to discontinue our internal taxes. These, covering our land with officers and opening our doors to their intrusions, had already begun that process of domiciliary vexation which, once entered, is scarcely to be restrained from reaching successively every article of produce and property. If among these taxes some minor ones fell which had not been inconvenient, it was because their amount would not have paid the officers who collected them, and because if they had any merit the State authorities might adopt them, instead of others less approved.

The remaining revenue, on the consumption of foreign articles, is paid cheerfully by those who can afford to add foreign luxuries to domestic comforts, being collected on our seaboard and frontiers only, and incorporated with the transactions of our mercantile citizens; it may be the pleasure and pride of an American to ask what farmer, what mechanic, what laborer ever sees a tax-gather of the United States.

That is the language of Mr. Jefferson. As already stated, on account of the difficulties that had grown up on the question of whisky taxation during Washington's administration, Jefferson had set his head very firmly against a tax of this character. There was nothing further of the internal-revenue system until the administration of Mr. Madison, when the war of 1812 made it necessary during part of Madison's administration to enact laws very similar to those we now have. They were, however, war measures, intended as such, not as permanent measures, and they were repealed very soon after the end of the war. The war ended practically with the battle of New Orleans, on the 8th of January, 1815, and the Congress of the United States passed a law repealing the internal-revenue laws, which took effect on the 31st of December, 1817. So they were only permitted to remain in existence as a war measure during the war and for three years after the termination of the war.

What have we done in this case? We enacted as a war measure and during the war the present system of internal-revenue laws. Of course there have been amendments since the war, but we did not act as wisely probably as our fathers did when we continued this war tax for nearly twenty years after the termination of the war and when we now attempt to make it permanent.

I have heard a great deal said recently about the war tariff, and it has been claimed by a large majority of my own party in Congress that it needed revision and modification. I agree to that; but I think it needs it on a plan very different from that of establishing a sliding scale of a certain per cent. of reduction. There are inequalities in the tariff that ought not to be there, and when the Republican party modified the tariff in 1883 they did not correct those inequalities to the extent that they ought to have been corrected. Therefore I have no quarrel with my own party or with anybody else on the question of the necessity of a proper revision of the tariff; but I do not see the propriety of making a point upon the tariff as a war tariff and having nothing to say about the internal revenue, which was strictly a war measure, and only justified according to the common usages of the Government and the practices of our people by the war.

I know that it is said that men pay the tax on whisky and tobacco more cheerfully than they would upon their shoes or their clothes or their hats or some other articles that may be necessary for themselves and their families, and that it is better to raise the revenue that way because they will pay it. There are a good many other articles that men and women would pay taxes on very cheerfully rather than do without them. The people of this country would pay a heavy tax on coffee rather than do without it, and I admit that the people of this country would pay a very heavy tax on whisky rather than do without it; but the question is whether the country is really benefited more by collecting it in this way. Take a man of very small means with a family, who is determined to have his dram occasionally no matter what it costs, and so far as the injury to the family is concerned or the diminution of the means necessary to the support of the family is concerned it injures them just as much to pay the tax on the whisky he drinks as it would to pay a like amount on any of the other articles necessary to the use of the family. The other articles may be necessary and the whisky may not be necessary, but that does not alter the case; he will use whisky whether it is necessary or not. He may believe it is necessary, or he may determine to have it as a luxury, but it diminishes the means for the support of his little family just as much in the one case as in the other if the same amount is expended.

Therefore there is really nothing in the cry that we very often hear, that it is the easiest way to collect a revenue and the proper way to collect it, because people will pay it more cheerfully in that way. It costs after all $100,000,000 of the people's money to pay $100,000,000 on whisky and tobacco, and it costs $100,000,000 of the people's money to pay $100,000,000 on taxes raised in any other way; so that there is not after all so much in that point as we have often heard claimed for it.

But, Mr. President, there is another thing that is a little peculiar about this matter. We have heard in the Senate from time to time a great deal said about the importance of collecting the money on the internal-revenue system, and the leading advocates of it have had a great deal of sympathy with the people. They tell us that it is a great hardship to collect a tariff on a man's wool hat or his trace-chains or anything else he is obliged to use; and they complain a great deal in behalf of the people of such collections of revenue; but the whisky-men stand willing at any time to pay fifty, seventy-five, or one hundred million dollars per annum on whisky and tobacco, or more especially on whisky, for the tobacco-men are clamoring for a reduction or abolition of the tax on tobacco. But you never hear the whisky men complain. If a bill is introduced or an amendment is introduced in the Senate to abolish the whisky tax or take off a portion of it, to make the amount collected less than it is now, we see none of the friends of the distiller voting for the reduction.

It must be a very great pleasure to the whisky men to pay taxes; and they are always insisting that we are oppressing the poor people by the tariff, and they very patriotically say, "Put it on us; fifty millions, one hundred millions, if you please; we are perfectly willing to pay it; we make no objection to it." No doubt the whisky men are just as patriotic as a like number of other citizens, and I suppose they have no right to claim more patriotism than others have. I must suspect, therefore, that there is a motive in all this, that there is some personal interest in it all. They would not be so willing to pay $100,000,000 or any other large sum of taxation per annum if it came out of their own pockets and was a burden to them. But it does not; not a dollar of it, so far as I am aware. It is charged up to the consumer. The 90 cents a gallon is paid by the men who drink the whisky. It is therefore a tax upon the people and not upon the distillers.

But there is another side to it. If there were not a very large profit in this business the whisky men would not be so patriotic in never asking the abolition of the tax and their Representatives never voting to reduce the tax. We have heard a great deal from their Representatives on the subject of monopoly and the tyranny of monopoly in this country. Now, sir, I suppose ever candid man knows that the whisky monopoly, the whisky ring, as it is sometimes called, is much the largest and grandest monopoly on this continent. None other that I know has so many peculiar privileges as it has or is so big a monopoly as it is, and it is very natural in that case that it struggles to maintain it. I do not wonder at that.

How does the matter stand? These liscensed distillers are usually men of large means. They make large quantities of whisky. They pay the revenue on it, and they charge it up to the consumer. How much do they make?

It has been said sometimes that if we should abolish the tax the temperance people would be very much offended at that; that they desire a law on the statute-book that imposes a heavy tax on whisky. I do not know whether the temperance people have very much interest in this question in that shape. If by this taxation we curtail the quantity that is made, and bring it below the demand, and reduce the consumption there might be something in it; but the licensed distillers make, in connection with what runs the blockade, as the term sometimes is, all the whisky they can sell to all the people in the United States. Nobody is stinted; everybody has just as much as he wants. It is said it is drugged by the dealers sometimes. I do not know how that is; but there is certainly plenty for everybody. The distillers keep all they can sell at home and all they can find a market for abroad all the time; and they keep from seventy-five to one hundred million gallons lying in store in bonded warehouse waiting for a consumer.

In the discussion here last March a year it was admitted by the advocates of a measure then pending that there were at that time 84,000,000 gallons lying in bonded warehouse. They keep about that amount in addition to all they can find a foreign market for, and in addition to all that they can get the people of this country to drink. Therefore the temperance people need not be very uneasy about this question, so far as the tax on the distillers is concerned, for it certainly does not diminish the quantity. They make enough for each, and enough for all, and they are glad to sell to all.

But, Mr. President, as I understand it, they have privileges and benefits that no other class of people do have. For instance, they are permitted when they make their whisky to put it in bonded warehouse, and it lies there for three years, if they choose to have it remain, without the payment of tax. After the first year they pay, I believe, 5 per cent. interest on the tax.

Mr. BECK. No.

Mr. BROWN. Has that been abolished?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from Kentucky says they pay no interest. I thank him for the suggestion, for I was under the impression they had to pay interest the last two years. Then they pay no interest. They have the right to put the whisky in bonded warehouse and keep it there for three years without paying any interest. We would naturally suppose they ought to be at the expense of storage, because there is a very large income to them from the storage. Everybody knows that a gallon of bourbon when it is new is not worth half as much as a gallon of bourbon when it is three years old. It is one of the things that are benefited and greatly increased in value by storage and by time. It would not be unnatural to require them to pay the expense of keeping it in store, but we do not require that. We pay the gaugers and the storekeepers out of the Treasury of the United States, and after we have guarded it for them by the agents of the Government for three years, if they should then choose, there being a demand in a foreign market for it, to export it we do not get a dollar of tax upon it. We have simply taken it in hand for their benefit, and we have stored their whisky for them for three years, and we have guarded it by our agents paid out of the Treasury of the United States for three years, and at the end of that time if they choose to export it we get nothing on it. And they get a reduction of seven gallons and a half out of each forty gallons for leakage for the three years while we guard it for them, on which we get no revenue. Probably there is a ten-cent exportation stamp or some other stamp—ten cents goes on a twenty-gallon keg, about half a cent a gallon. If there is any other tax of any other character imposed upon it I am not aware of it. That is doing a good deal for them.

I have heard it said, however, that the importer who brings his goods into this country has a like right or privilege of storing them in bonded warehouse for three or four years, but not upon the same terms and not with the same privileges and advantages which we extend to the whisky men. They are our special favorites. The foreign importer may put his imported goods into bonded warehouse and let them lie there one year, and if within one year he withdraws them for consumption he is only bound to pay the tariff and necessary expenses; but those necessary expenses include the storage and guarding and everything that may be necessary to take care of the goods. He has that to pay. The whisky man does not have it to pay, but the United States Government pays it for him.

Not only that, but if the foreign importer keeps his goods longer than one year and withdraws them from the bonded warehouse for consumption within the period between the end of one year and the end of three years, he not only has to pay the tax, but, as I find in the statutes, he has to pay 10 per cent. of the amount of the tariff added. That, then, does not put the importer of foreign goods and the manufacturer of whisky upon the same terms, nor does it extend to each the same benefits. In the one case the whisky man after the end of the year may withdraw his whisky for consumption or for foreign exportation without paying anything of the expenses or of the guards. The importer of foreign goods who after the end of the year withdraws his goods for consumption must pay all expenses and 10 per cent. added to the tariff. So there is no equality at all.

Then there is another advantage which these gentlemen have, and I never hear any complaint of that in the tariff discussions. There is a heavy duty on foreign whisky. I am not sure that I recollect, but I believe it is $2 a gallon. The tariff is $2 a gallon, which is prohibitory and excludes foreign whisky from the market, and gives our whisky manufacturers the monopoly here. The foreign manufacturer of whisky comes to our ports with his cargo of whisky and he seeks to enter it. He must pay $2 a gallon tariff before he can enter it. Then their interests are guarded at the ports by the Government by a prohibitory tariff, and their productions are guarded for them at home free of charge. Every advantage is given to them that they could ask. They are a favorite, protected class—the pets of the Government.

In this state of the case, Mr. President, it does seem to me that the small man, the citizen with small means, ought to have a little share in this monopoly. It was stated, I believe, yesterday, that heretofore we have excluded those who did not use as much as four bushels of grain per day. We shut down on them. They were too small to take any of this benefit, and we do not permit them to distill at all. Now, the proposition of the House of Representatives is to permit those who do not distill more than ten bushels a day to be relieved of all the care and trouble of officers, and to permit them, as I understand it, to give in and pay their taxes free from that; in other words, they are relieved against everything but the payment of the tax.

The Senate Committee on Appropriations meets that with a proposition to strike out that provision of the House bill and to insert a provision which makes it absolutely prohibitory, and does not permit a man who has not a distillery large enough to consume ten bushels of grain per day to distill at all. In other words, this great boon and this grand monopoly is reserved entirely for the wealthy whisky ring. It will not do, they say, to fritter it away. We must not let the small men have anything to do with it. We must not let poor men take any part in it. If men do not distill as much as ten bushels a day we will not allow them to compete at all. That is, as I understand it, this proposition, and it is outrageous. Now, there are a vast number of men in this country, from Pennsylvania to Alabama, all along the Alleghany and Blue Ridge ranges of mountains, who have small farms of rich land, many of whom are forty or fifty or sixty miles from a railroad, who make their grain, and it is their principal resource for the support of their families. They are obliged to have what are usually termed necessaries; they are obliged to have sugar and coffee and salt and things of that character. To undertake to haul their grain fifty or sixty miles to a railroad for sale would cost one-half the price of it; in other words, it costs about half what they get for corn to carry it to market. If they can, as they have been in the habit of doing heretofore, distill that corn, though it may be but a small quantity, and make one, two, or three barrels of whisky, they can put the whole crop into on ox-cart and carry it to market and dispose of it and buy their necessaries.

The purport of this amendment is to cut off absolutely that privilege from all that vast class of people. They shall not distill at all. If they raise grain they must do the best they can with it or dispose of it in some other way, or they must haul it probably across the Blue Ridge Mountains to the railroad and pay the expense and not get more than half the real value of it, at the end of the whole trouble, because they have to pay half for hauling it.

Mr. President, there is great inequality and injustice in this. Why should all this very large class of poor people, of common people, of people of small means, be cut off entirely from this privilege, in order that the wealthy licensed whisky men of the West may have the monopoly of the business? It is not right, it is not fair, it is not democratic, it is not good republican doctrine. It is not right in any possible view, and it ought not to be done. I suppose by another session of Congress, if there be still too much intrusion upon the prerogatives and privileges of this great monopoly, it will be easy to bring in another bill and say that no one should distill who does not consume twenty bushels or fifty bushels per day. Doubtless if we commence legislation upon that we shall carry it far enough so that the favored few shall have all the benefits, and all who attempt to compete shall go to jail; and nobody else dare intrude, the penalty being the jail and a fine; nobody else dare compete, or he must be imprisoned if he does.

But, Mr. President, it has been said in the debate that in the case of these men who run small distilleries it takes too large a proportion of the value of the whisky to pay the immense swarm of revenue collectors so graphically described by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] yesterday, who demonstrated very clearly that it takes a great deal larger force on alternate years; when the election year comes round it takes an exceedingly large force to collect the revenue from the distilleries. In other words, the Republican party has need of more agents and retainers and persons in its interest to travel over the country at public expense from place to place to electioneer for their candidates' aid in this, that, and the other locality. More are needed in the election year than in any other year, and consequently the cost of collecting the revenue is about double in the election year, as shown by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. President, there is an easier way to get at all that. The people of this country are not all dishonest; they are not all knaves; they do not all need constant watching for fear they will appropriate something that does not belong to them. I know in my State that the section of the country where most of the distilling is done, Northeast Georgia particularly, was the strongest Union section when the war commenced. I know we had trouble to keep those people along with us, and keep many of them from going over to fight against us for the Union. They were honest mountaineers, they were men of true grit and courage. They had all loved the Union and they would have stood by it, and it was with great difficulty that we prevented a great deal of trouble. Since the end of the war they have been so much oppressed, they have been so badly treated by the revenue laws and revenue officers, that there is probably no place in the South now where there is less of real love for the Union and its laws.

The internal-revenue laws as they have been administered have driven that people far away from the devotion which they entertained for the Government and its glory and its laws prior to the war. In other words, while there is no rebellion, and no talk of rebellion, they murmur and complain, and justly, too, that their Government is oppressing them tyrannically, and that they are trampled under foot for the slightest and most trivial pretext, as for selling a small quantity of whisky, or when the law made it penal—that has probably been changed since—for selling a twist, or a hand, of tobacco, they have been seized by the revenue officers and carried a hundred miles to Atlanta, placed in jail, kept there for trial for months, then found guilty, possibly, and imprisoned, and sent home ruined. No people can love a Government that oppresses them in that way. We ought to prohibit all such tyrannical measures, and not permit that sort of oppression.

Well, but, it is said, how then will you enforce the revenue laws? Let everybody distill who wants to; make a law that where the distillery is below a certain number of bushels per day, ten, if you please, or twenty if you think better, each distiller under heavy penalties shall give in and pay tax on every gallon he makes; require him to give it in under oath; and if they are required to do that the great mass of them, say nine-tenths of them, are honest and will make honest returns. Make it as penal as you please. If they swear falsely put them in the penitentiary, and make it penal for them to sell their production until they have reported it and paid the revenue. You can then dismiss all the swarm of leeches that are eating out our substance, and keep only honest officials, and you will get twice as much revenue from that section under that system as you get now. But if it costs you all that it is worth to collect the revenue there, if I am entirely wrong on that point, then you have no right to fix a class rule, and say that every man who is wealthy enough to distill a number of bushels equal to the rule prescribed may go on and do so by taking a license and there shall be no penalty; but if his neighbor who is able to distill but half the amount is willing to pay the revenue you deny him the right to do so, and you put him in jail if he competes with his wealthier neighbor. That is not democratic; that is not, as I understand it, according to the principles of republican government, and I can not support any measure which draws such a discrimination, which builds up with still more power a grand monopoly at the expense of the great mass of the people of the United States who have less means. It is unjust legislation in favor of the rich at the expense of the poor, and it ought not to receive the sanction of this Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire now to have the point of order decided which was made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] yesterday in reference to this amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest that the question had better be taken upon the motion to strike out alone. I know that a motion to strike out and insert is not divisible, but the question might be taken on the motion to strike out and not decide the whole question by a single vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand that a question of order is made?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order on so much of the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations as is to insert new words. That part of the amendment is not in order. It is clearly, the Chair thinks, within the letter and spirit of the rule on that subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope we shall have a vote on the motion to strike out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the residue of the amendment, being the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations to strike out from line 960 to line 978 on pages 40 and 41 of the printed bill.

Mr. BECK. Would it be in order to modify the proposition as made by the Committee on Appropriations?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be in order to move any amendment which Senators may desire that is allowable under the rules after the question of striking out is disposed of. It is in order to move to perfect the text proposed to be stricken out, provided the motion be within the rules as to appropriation bills.

Mr. BECK. What I desire to ascertain is, the Chair having decided the proposition made by the Committee on Appropriations out of order because it is new legislation, whether it would not be in order to change that now and to move its adoption again if it can be modified so that the point of order can be avoided.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks under the order of yesterday that the committee amendments should be first gone through with; that would not now be in order. It will be in order for any Senator to move any amendment to this part of the bill when the committee amendments are disposed of, as under the agreement of yesterday the committee amendments are to be gone through with first, or by general consent it may be received before.

Mr. BECK. I propose now to amend the committee amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order to amend the text proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. SHERMAN. But not now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the motion to strike out, it is in order to move to perfect the paragraph proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. BECK. That is not the proposition I desire. I understand the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate offered an amendment to be found from line 978 to line 998. That is not in order as offered, I understand. Now, I propose to so amend that as to make it in order if I can by leaving out the words from line 978 to 980:

And section 3261 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows.

And then say:

No part of the money hereby appropriated shall be expended for the maintenance of a grain distillery which has not a mashing capacity of ten bushels a day, and—

And then let the words used by the committee follow:

No collector shall approve a bond of any distiller, &c.

That is what I desire to submit.

Mr. SHERMAN. That would be subject to the same objection.

Mr. BECK. I think not.

Mr. SHERMAN. Because it indirectly repeals the law.

Mr. BECK. As I propose it it is not objectionable to the point of order, and I have looked at the matter with some care.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is for the Chair to decide.

Mr. BECK. If I may be allowed to state why I offer this, I will say that there is now no limitation on the right of the Internal Revenue Department to indicate what shall be the minimum of the mashing capacity of a grain distillery. That is simply regulated by the orders of the Internal Revenue Department. They do not in fact permit any less than four bushels to be run or licensed, but they have the right to allow a distillery of one bushel to be licensed and run and to furnish a storekeeper for it. They have made that regulation themselves; there is no law in regard to it, and this proposition is simply to say that the money hereby appropriated shall not be used by the Internal Revenue Department so as to allow them to license any distillery that has not a mashing capacity of ten bushels a day. There is no law in regard to it now.

We are making an appropriation in this bill of $2,300,000 for salaries and expenses of agents and surveyors, for fees and expenses of gaugers, for salaries of storekeepers, and for miscellaneous expenses. And we make an appropriation in line 878—

For salaries and expenses of collectors and deputy collectors, $1,850,000.

There is over $4,000,000 that we are taking out of the Treasury for the use of this Department.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question? I am quite in sympathy with the object the Senator from Kentucky has in the suggested amendment, but if I understand the statement of the Senator from Kentucky, it is that there is no law now restraining the Commissioner of Internal Revenue from licensing a thousand distilleries with the minimum capacity of one bushel a day, for that is the way I understand it.

Mr. HARRIS. Then if his amendment should be offered and adopted it would create a rule of law that does not exist now, would it not?

Mr. BECK. It would impose a regulation on the department so far as the appropriation we are now making is concerned, preventing the Commissioner from squandering it as he is now doing.

Mr. HARRIS. The point on my mind is, will it not create a rule of law controlling a public officer which does not now exist?

Mr. BECK. It will.

Mr. HARRIS. And if that be true, is it not legislation in the sense of the rule?

Mr. BECK. I think not. We are now called upon to give money out of the public Treasury to run a particular service which is not regulated or limited by any law. The appropriation may make a rule of law. We give $4,000,000 for the service. Without that the Commissioner can not run the system a day. Independent of running that whole machinery with the money we give him, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has been running it in a way that the Congress of the United States says is not good for the public service, not by virtue of any law, but by virtue of regulations that he himself makes. Now, I insist that Congress has the right when it takes out of the public Treasury $4,000,000 for gaugers, storekeepers, collectors, and assistant collectors, and all the machinery of running that department, to say to its head, "You shall not take this money that we give you and expend it on these little distilleries," which it was proved yesterday and are admitted everywhere to be run in fraud and not in the interest of the public service; "but the money that we take out of the Treasury and give to you shall be used in such a way that it shall redound to the interests of the public service, and not be given to a body of men for rendering no service."

If we have not that power, then we are at the mercy of every bureau of every Department, and they may spend all the money we give them at any time and we can not put any limitation on their action. Congress is here at the mercy of every one of its bureau officers to spend the money we give as they please, although we may know and although the records may show and the facts stand admitted that the money we are giving them out of the public Treasury is wasted and thrown away upon objects worse than useless. It is entirely in the power of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to start one-bushel houses under the present law or a half-bushel house; he may permit a man to make a quart and pay $4 a day to a storekeeper to protect that quart of whisky, and Congress is powerless to prevent him under the suggestions now made as to what are the rules of the Senate. We are to give him the $4,000,000, and he can start a thousand distilleries to-morrow running a bushel a day each or a quart a day each, and pay men $4 a day to stand there and watch that, and so squander the $4,000,000 upon that class of houses, and we can not say that he shall not do it; it is not in order; the Senate has no power over its own appropriations to say what shall be done with the money it gives, but that it shall be expended as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may see fit to waste it. That is the argument, that is the position we are assumed to be in.

I would rather vote against giving him one dollar than to give him that absolute power. I suppose there is no law to prevent us from saying we will not give the money unless so and so is done. Perhaps that might be a new law, as we have been giving it heretofore without restraint. I do not know how the Chair would rule upon that; but I suppose we have the absolute right, if we are satisfied that the money we are giving is being squandered, to say that it shall not be squandered any longer or to refuse to give it unless there is some limitation put upon the use of it. If the rule of the Senate forbids this, it is an absurd, ridiculous rule and ought not to be regarded. I do not believe that is the rule of the Senate, although perhaps I may be in a small minority in that regard. It ought not to be the rule. Why, sir, there could be no evil corrected, there could be no restraint put upon abuses even in the expenditure of the very money we are voting to any Department or branch of this Government if that is the rule. Complaints may be made, admissions may be so absolute that there is no doubt about the fact that all the money we gave for the current year has been absolutely wasted, and yet we are to give the same man four millions, five millions, any amount of millions, and we are told that it has got to go on in that way because it is the practice of some bureau to expend it in that way, and we can not change it. I am not seeking by this amendment to make a general law. I am saying that this money we now give shall be given with this limitation, that it shall be expended in such a way as not to produce these results.

I have only one more word to say in regard to a remark made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN]. He is mistaken when he announces that it costs such an enormous amount to collect this tax—I think he said $100,000,000 to collect $100,000,000.

Mr. BROWN. Oh, no. I was referring to the remarks made by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] about the small distilleries.

Mr. BECK. But I understood the Senator to say the cost of its collection was absolutely enormous.

Mr. BROWN. I only referred to the small distilleries.

Mr. BECK. There never was a more legitimate system fairly collected than the system now adopted of getting revenue.

Mr. BROWN. I did not refer to the collection of internal revenue in general.

Mr. BECK. While the Senator was speaking I was so much struck with his remark that I turned to the report, and I found that in the first district of California we collected from distilled spirits over $2,000,000; in the first Illinois, over $6,800,000; in the fifth Illinois, $13,000,000; in the fourth Indiana, $2,000,000; in the fifth Iowa, $7,000,000; in the fifth Kentucky, $6,000,000; in the sixth Kentucky, $3,000,000; in the seventh Kentucky, $2,000,000; in the first Missouri, $2,000,000; in the first Ohio, $9,000,000. In these ten districts from whisky alone $51,000,000 were collected last year, and the average cost for collection was less than 1½ per cent., and in those districts three-fourths of the whole revenue was collected, and every dollar goes into the Treasury of the United States, and not into the pockets of anybody, except the 1½ per cent., the cost of collection. Can there be a better system of obtaining $74,000,000 than that, provided it is purged from the evils that exist now in squandering it upon the little distilleries that are not carried on legitimately?

The sale of whisky is regulated everywhere. A man can not obtain a license to sell it in any city in Georgia, Kentucky, or elsewhere unless he is shown to be a man of good moral character and will keep an orderly house. A man is not allowed to make whisky unless he is shown to be a respectable man, a man of good character, who will obey the law. We required him for a long time to pay his own storekeeper, but that was found to be oppressive and we relieved him from that, and now all we ask is that he shall make enough whisky at least to pay expenses and give a decent assurance that he is going to carry on a legitimate business.

But that has nothing to do with the point of order. I propose to have the words I have read inserted after striking out the words about the amendment of the section of the Revised Statutes which is not in fact amended and insert:

That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be expended in the maintenance of any grain distillery which has not a mashing capacity of ten bushels a day.

And then inserting what follows from line 981; and I shall appeal from the decision of the Chair on that point of order and ask a yea-and-nay vote of the Senate, because if it can not be done in this particular appropriation and we can not in any way curtail the action of the Department we might just as well refuse to give them the money altogether, because it is being wasted and squandered in ways that it ought not to be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky will send to the desk his amendment and it will be read; after which the Chair will rule upon the point of order.

The SECRETARY. In line 978, in place of the words—

And section 3261 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows"—

It is proposed to insert:

No part of the money hereby appropriated shall be expended for the maintenance of any grain distillery which has not a mashing capacity of ten bushels a day; and no collector shall approve the bond of any distiller until all the requirements of the law, and all regulations made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in relation to distilleries in pursuance thereof, have been complied with; nor shall the collector hereafter approve any bond of a grain distiller the survey of whose distillery shall be for a less capacity than ten bushels of grain per day; nor shall the survey of any grain distillery be made for a less capacity than ten bushels of grain per day; nor shall the per diem capacity of any grain distillery be reduced below ten bushels. Every collector who violates this provision shall forfeit and pay $2,000 and be dismissed from office; and every distiller of grain who, after the 1st day of November, 1884, operates his distillery on a less capacity than ten bushels of grain per day, shall be liable to the fines, forfeitures, and imprisonment specified in section 3260 of the Revised Statutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the motion of the Senator from Kentucky to be a motion to amend the amendment recommended by the committee. That is, the committee's amendment now is to strike out certain lines of the bill; the Senator from Kentucky moves to amend that amendment so as to make it a motion to strike out the lines that are run through and insert what has been sent to the Chair. Does the Chair correctly understand the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BECK. That is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that an amendment to the amendment of the committee is in order, although usually a motion to strike out is taken by itself; but the Chair thinks that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky is liable to the same objection as the one reported from the committee. The Chair thinks that the difference between a limitation on the expenditure of money and an affirmative provision by law guiding the conduct of officers already established by law, is quite shadowy. It may be illustrated by other clauses of this legislative and judicial appropriation bill. There are provisions, the Chair supposes, for the salaries of judges. It would be competent, the Chair thinks, under the rule for the Senate and the House of Representatives to put in under their rules a provision that money appropriated for a particular judge should only be expended at certain dates and in certain quantities, monthly or quarterly; but if an amendment went further and provided that the money should not be paid to a judge whose salary was fixed by law unless the court should be held four times a year, and declared that it should be held four times a year and that grand and petit juries should be summoned and that the jurisdiction of the court should be different from what the law already makes it, embracing other objects or fewer objects, that would not be in order. At the same time if in some bill there was a provision for the erection of a court-house, the construction and regulation of which the law had not already provided for, that item of appropriation might be limited and its expenditure directed through such agencies as the law should provide. It was on that theory that the Chair held some time ago that the amendment to the naval appropriation bill for the construction of new ships was in order, because it was purely a matter of the expenditure of money not previously regulated by law in any way and therefore merely a business transaction not required to be in a separate bill. The Chair is obliged to rule that this amendment of the Senator from Kentucky is not in order.

Mr. BECK. Would it make any difference, in the opinion of the Chair, if we were assured and believed that there was now no law regulating what shall be the maximum or mininum mash capacity of a distillery? In the case stated by the Chair as to changing the terms of court the matter is regulated by law; but the distillery to which we now apply a mininum capacity is not regulated by law, simply an order of the department, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not now mean to hold on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky as a whole—as it must be taken for the purposes of the question of order—that it would not be in order to say simply as the written part of the Senator's amendment is—

That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be expended for the maintenance of any distillery which has not a mashing capacity of ten bushels a day.

That question would arise if that should be offered alone.

Mr. BECK. I will offer that by itself, submitting to the first ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to think that the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky in that form is in order, and will so rule.

Mr. ALLISON. I submit to the Senator from Kentucky that if he succeeds in his amendment as now offered, simply striking out the House provision and inserting what he proposes to insert, he accomplishes exactly what the original House provision seeks to do. It seeks to prevent either storekeepers or gaugers from appearing at these small distilleries; and he will accomplish by his amendment, unless he adds the prohibitory clause, just what the original provision of the House proposed.

Mr. BECK. The chairman will allow me to say that I was endeavoring to ascertain what would be in order and would perfect this amendment, but I do not desire to offer it now or interfere until the Senate has acted upon all those portions which the committee have stricken out.

Mr. ALLISON. I merely wished to call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky to the fact that his amendment as he now offers it will accomplish precisely what the bill now accomplishes by the provision of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky, which will be again read.

Mr. BECK. No; I will offer that after the action of the Senate has been taken in regard to the committee's amendment to strike out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn temporarily. The question recurs on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations to strike out the lines which have been read.

Mr. BECK. The proposition is, as I understand it, to strike out all after the word "dollars," in line 960, down to and including the word "warehouse," in line 978.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the proposition.

Mr. BECK. I ask if that proposition is divisible? I desire to vote to strike out all from line 960 to and including the word "operated," in line 971. The other relates to a different subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is divisible.

Mr. BROWN. I call for a division of the question, because as to the special warehouses provided by the House, from line 971 to line 978, I think a very different question is presented.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question on the demand of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] will be divided, and first taken on striking out all after the word "dollars," in line 960 to and including the word "operated," in line 971.

Mr. VANCE. I call for the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BROWN. Let the words proposed to be stricken out be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paragraph now proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The SECRETARY. The words proposed to be stricken out are:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall exempt all distilleries which mash ten bushels of grain or less per day from the operation of the provisions of title 35 of the Revised Statutes relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to payment of the tax; and said distilleries shall be run and operated without storekeepers; and said Secretary may exempt any distillery or all distilleries which mash twenty-five bushels of grain per day from the operation of the provision of said title relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to the payment of the tax; and any distillery so exempted shall be run as fruit distilleries are now operated.

Mr. VANCE. I simply want to understand the effect of this vote. I understand it to be that if the Senate strikes out this provision in the bill, it having been held to be out of order to insert anything in place of that which is stricken out, the law will stand as it is now, without any limitation whatsoever.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not held that it is out of order to insert anything. The Chair has only held that it was not in order to insert what the Committee on Appropriations proposed to insert. The question is on agreeing to the recommendation of the committee to strike out the first division, which has just been read, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who is absent, but as his colleague [Mr. DAWES] votes "yea" on this question and I propose so to vote, I will record my vote in the affirmative.

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. VANCE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. KENNA. My colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired on all questions with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN]. I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. GROOME. I am paired on all questions with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER]. My colleague [Mr. GORMAN] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Lapham,	Platt,
Beck,	Garland,	McMillan,	Plumb,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harris,	Mahone,	Saulsbury,
Cockrell,	Harrison,	Mitchell,	Sawyer,
Coke,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Sewell,
Conger,	Hill,	Pendleton,	Sherman,
Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Pike,	Wilson.

NAYS—13.

Bayard,	Fair,	Lamar,	Vest.
Brown,	Gibson,	Pugh,
Butler,	Hampton,	Ransom,
Call,	Jonas,	Slater,

ABSENT—35.

Colquitt,	Hoar,	Miller of Cal.,	Walker,
Cullom,	Ingalls,	Miller of N. Y.,	Williams.
Dolph,	Jackson,	Morgan,

So the motion to strike out was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on striking out the residue of the paragraph.

Mr. BECK. On that I ask for the yeas and nays or a division, I do not care which.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will not press that. It seems to me this last proviso should go out, inasmuch as the first part of the provision is stricken out. It relates to the distilleries which are absolutely exempted here.

Mr. BECK. Oh, no.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BECK. It relates to all distilleries.

Mr. ALLISON. No; it reads:

Provided, That special warehouses may be established by the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he may cause to be deposited the product of any number of said distilleries.

That is, the distilleries which have been exempted.

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon.

Mr. ALLISON. The proviso proceeds:

To be designated by him by his order, and in which any of said distillers may deposit his product, and when so deposited shall be subject to all the laws and regulations, &c.

Mr. SHERMAN. It only relates to small distilleries.

Mr. ALLISON. It only relates to small distilleries, and it only relates to those distilleries exempted. Until the distilled spirits get into the general warehouse they would not be subject to the provisions of this proposed law.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Kentucky is thinking as I did when I first looked at it. I thought probably there was no objection to it, because there was a proposition pending before the Committee on Finance a year or two ago authorizing several distillers to club their whisky in one distillery at a place to be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury, so that it might be kept with less expense and less danger. But that is not this provision. This is a provision made for small distilleries, and it ought to go out with the rest of the paragraph. It would not do to put it in now without adding other provisions, because there must be some provision for removing the spirits from one warehouse to the other; there must be some regulation, such as was contained in the bill that I had in my mind and which the Senator no doubt had in his mind, by which the Government would be protected in the removal of whisky from one place to another; that is, the spirits would have to be gauged and measured before the removal from one warehouse to another. But those are provisions not found here, and this clause ought to be stricken out. It relates only to small distilleries and enables the distillers to bring their product together so as to be kept at less expense.

Mr. BECK. The operation of the measure the Senator from Ohio suggests as having been considered by the Finance Committee a year ago, and which was passed by the Senate I believe unanimously (I know it was reported by the committee and recommended by Mr. Raum), was precisely the same as this if the word "said" should be stricken out in line 974, before "distilleries," and the word "said," in line 975, before the word "distillers."

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is mistaken. Under that provision ample arrangements were made for a gauge and examination before the removal of the spirits. This does not contain that.

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon. If the Senator will look he will see that it reads—

And when so deposited shall be subject to all the laws and regulations as to bonds, tax, removal, and otherwise, as is now provided by law for other warehouses.

That covers everything connected with it.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is not the provision. This only applies after the deposit is made in a new place. This is subject to the same provision that existed before, but there is no provision made here for an inspection, gauging, &c., of the whisky before it is removed from one place to the other. I think, therefore, it had better be dropped out here.

I think it would be an act of wisdom in the next change in the internal-revenue system to provide that wherever whisky is manufactured at any distillery it shall be taken to a large distillery warehouse, built under the direction of the Government like a Government warehouse in the customs service and guarded against fire and the possibility of loss. Such a provision as that in regard to whisky would be a very proper one; the very moment it is manufactured to have it gauged and carried to some other place, where it would be secure against fire and against probable interference or fraud. But this clause is not sufficiently guarded for passage now.

Mr. BECK. Would it be in order, before a vote is taken on the proviso, to move to strike out the word "said," before "distilleries," in line 974, and the word "said," before "distillers," in line 975? If so, I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that motion is in order.

Mr. ALLISON. I submit to the Senator from Kentucky that that will not cover the case. The trouble with this provision is that it was intended for the small distilleries, and it was prepared with that view. Now, the Senator from Kentucky desires to get in some provision that will apply to all the distilleries in the United States. Such a provision ought to be prepared with the utmost care, and would probably require three, or four, or five sections, because the distilled spirits must be followed from the distilleries into the general warehouses, they must be gauged in and gauged out, and a record kept constantly, or else frauds would be committed under the provision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky moves to amend the paragraph which is proposed to be stricken out by striking out the word "said," before "distilleries," in line 974. The question is on agreeing to the motion to strike out that word.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky also moves to strike out the word "said," in line 975, where it occurs before the word "distillers."

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to strike out the words "of said," in line 975.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky modify his amendment?

Mr. BECK. Yes; that is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky moves to strike out the words "of said," preceding the word "distillers," in line 975.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on striking out the proviso as amended.

Mr. HARRIS. After the word "distillers," in line 975, to make it perfectly consistent with the object of the Senator from Kentucky, I move to insert the words "so established."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 975, after the word "distillers," it is proposed to insert "so established;" so as to read:

And in which any distillers so established may deposit his product.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion to amend.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on striking out the proviso as amended.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, one word in regard to that. We all agree, I think, that the most insecure place where distilled spirits are deposited to remain after they are manufactured, especially in the case of small distilleries, is in a little log warehouse attached to those distilleries, and that the best thing both for the Government and for the distillers is that the spirits should be removed to some place of safety where they can be held until offered for sale. I read yesterday what Commissioner Raum said in that regard. Senators perhaps may not recollect it, and I will read it again, because it is short:

The establishment and use of special bonded warehouses, as provided for in the second and other sections of the bill—

Referring to the bill that he then presented for the extension of time—

The establishment and use of special bonded warehouses, as provided for in the second and other sections of the bill, is a feature which I think can properly be looked upon with favor. These warehouses would no doubt be established by men of means and business standing at important points of trade, where transportation would be easy, and would be constructed as nearly as possible fire-proof. To these warehouses would be sent, by direction of the Commissioner, under section 3272 United States Revised Statutes, the spirits in warehouses which were deemed insecure, and, under the provisions of the present bill, the spirits in warehouses where the distilleries had been suspended for a year and upward.

To them would also be taken, on the application of the distiller, the spirits produced at small establishments, remote from railroad or other important lines of transportation, to the great advantage of the small manufacturers, who would thus be enabled to insure their goods at low rates, to obtain loans upon their warehouse receipts without difficulty, and to deliver their goods, when sold, to their customers without unnecessary delay in transportation. These warehouses would be under the control of the collectors and in the custody of storekeepers, and in my opinion the interests of the Government, as well as the convenience of the trade, would be promoted by their establishment.

At the close of his letter he says:

I venture the opinion that if Congress in its wisdom sees fit to adopt this branch of the bill it can be administered so as to protect the interests of the Government.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

GREEN B. RAUM, Commissioner.

The provision in this bill as it passed the House and as it has been amended reads:

That special warehouses may be established by the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he may cause to be deposited the product of any number of distilleries, to be designated by him by his order, and in which any distillers so established may deposit his product, and when so deposited shall be subject to all the laws and regulations as to bonds, tax, removal, and otherwise as is now provided by law for other warehouses.

Small lots of distilled spirits remaining in the little warehouses of course would not be removed to a special warehouse except under the orders of the Secretary of the Treasury or the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Everything necessary for the secure removal would be provided, because the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized by this provision to establish special warehouses, "in which he may cause to be deposited the product of any number of distilleries." In the very establishment of those warehouses he can make and will make all the provisions necessary for the safe removal, including gauging, measuring, and everything else necessary in regard to the spirits to be brought into them; the amount to leave the distillery warehouses will be ascertained; the amount that comes into the special warehouse will be ascertained; accurate accounts will be made. All that will be done by regulation, and when once there it would be subject to the same laws to which it would be subject if it should remain in the distillery warehouse.

The reason why we ought to give that permission is perfectly obvious. The Secretary of the Treasury is compelled so long as small lots of whisky remain in a distillery warehouse to keep a storekeeper there to watch them. Frequently, as I stated yesterday, the cost of keeping that officer is four times as great as all the revenue derived from the spirits. Being in insecure houses the spirits are subject to be destroyed by fire; they are subject to larceny; they are subject to be tampered with, besides keeping up a host of men to guard them, there being, as was shown yesterday by the Commissioner's own statement, seven hundred and eighty-two little distilleries now mashing less than ten bushels a day and one hundred and forty-six more mashing less than twenty-five bushels a day. There are nearly a thousand of them which could be so adjusted that the contents of thirty, forty, or fifty, where there were so many in a neighborhood, could be placed in a special fire-proof warehouse, where one storekeeper, some intelligent man, could guard the spirits just as well as the thirty or forty men now used in the thirty or forty little warehouses where there are from ten to twenty barrels, and in some perhaps not more than one barrel. Cases were shown a year or two ago during a discussion here where one man had guarded a keg of five gallons in the eighth district of Kentucky, and I have no doubt that in North Carolina there are many cases where they have guarded kegs for months, or staid by them—I do not know whether they guarded them or not.

It seems to me that no harm can come from this provision. I think the Commissioner himself would say so. The former Commissioner said so. The whole matter is in his control. The Secretary of the Treasury can put the safeguards around it. He is not compelled to do it; he may do it in his discretion. The right is given that special warehouses may be established by him. It does not compel him to do it. It takes no power out of his hands. If he does establish them, it is assumed that he will establish them with all the safeguards possible against fraud. Why should he not have the right to protect those spirits that are subject to tax and cut down the number of supernumeraries if in his judgment he thinks it best? I can not see why not.

If it is said that we have no warehouses in which to do it, they can be procured. We have out of 48,000 post-office buildings perhaps not over a hundred that are owned by the Government; and we always get them when required. If none suitable are offered for rent or occupation by the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury will not occupy those places any more than the Postmaster-General would for a post-office, or any other executive officer any other public building that he needs.

I have nothing more to say except that I can not see how the provision can possibly do any harm, and it will give the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue power to guard the United States in this tax and to secure the property much better than it is now secured.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the recommendation of the committee to strike out the proviso.

Mr. HARRIS. In the hurry of offering an amendment a few moments since I find that the word "distillers," in line 975, should be changed to the word "distilleries," and the word "his," after the word "deposit," should be changed to "their," in order to clearly express what I understand to be the object of the Senator from Kentucky in the amendment which he offered.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the Senator from Tennessee makes it worse by that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 975 it is proposed to change the word "distillers" to "distilleries," and to strike out the word "his" and insert "their;" so as to read:

And in which any distilleries may deposit their product.

Mr. BECK. I do not think that will do.

Mr. HARRIS. I shall not insist on the amendment if it does not meet the approval of the Senator from Kentucky.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

The question is on agreeing to the recommendation of the committee to strike out the proviso.

Mr. BECK. Let us have the yeas and nays on the question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I only desire to say one word. This is the dangerous and delicate part of the whole question of collecting revenue from distilled spirits. The provision as now suggested by the Senator from Kentucky applies to every distillery in the United States, and I think it is a very dangerous piece of legislation. I hope the proviso will not be retained in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the recommendotion of the committee to strike out the proviso.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GROOME (when Mr. GORMAN'S name was called). The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SEWELL (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague [Mr. MCPHERSON]. As I do not know how he would vote on this question, I refrain from voting.

Mr. VANCE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER], but understanding that he would vote "yea," I shall vote. I vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. FAIR. I am paired with my colleague, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES].

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—31.

Allison,	Garland,	Lapham,	Platt,
Brown,	Gibson,	Logan,	Pugh,
Butler,	Hampton,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Sherman,

Cockrell,	Harris,	Palmer,	Walker.
Colquitt,	Hoar,	Pendleton,
Cullom,	Jackson,	Plumb,
Dolph,	Jones of Nevada,	Ransom,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I believe everything is out of the bill now after line 960, as far as has been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is all stricken out after the word "dollars," in line 960 to and including the word "warehouses," in line 978.

Mr. BECK. I propose now to amend, by adding after the word "dollars," in line 960, what was read some time ago:

That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be expended for the maintenance of any grain distillery which has not a mashing capacity of ten bushels per day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Kentucky offering the amendment at this time, the order of the Senate having been that the committee amendments should first be considered?

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon. I will withdraw the amendment and offer it afterward.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withdraw it? The Chair was asking if there was objection to receiving the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I think I shall have to object, as a good many Senators have left the Chamber under the impression that we had passed from this question.

Mr. BECK. Very well; I shall offer it hereafter.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 999, after the word "provided," to strike out "further;" and, in line 1001, before the word "bushels," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "twenty;" so as to read:

And provided, That storekeepers, or storekeepers and gaugers, who are assigned to distilleries whose registered capacity is twenty bushels or less, shall receive $2 per day for their services.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1007, after the word "than," to strike out "are" and insert "15 per cent. in excess of the number;" and in line 1009, before the word "indispensably," to strike out "are;" so as to read:

And no collector in any district shall recommend, nor shall there be appointed or commissioned, more deputy collectors, storekeepers, storekeepers and gaugers, gaugers, inspectors, or other officers, or allowed to remain in commission more of any of said officers, at any one time, than 15 per cent. in excess of the number actually engaged in performing duty at the time, and indispensably necessary for the performance of said duty.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAPHAM. I offer an amendment to the bill now under consideration, which I move be printed and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 1011, before the word "agents," to strike out "five" and insert "twenty-five;" in line 1012, after the word "number," to insert "now;" and in the same line, after the word "by," to strike out "section 3152 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act approved June 19, 1878," and insert "law;" so as to read:

And hereafter there shall not be employed exceeding twenty-five agents in lieu of the number now authorized by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from the items for contingent expenses of the Treasury Department line 1021, in the following words:

For postage, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Independent Treasury," in the appropriations for the "office of the assistant treasurer at Boston," in line 1080, to increase the appropriation for the compensation of "assistant treasurer" from $4,500 to $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1097, to increase the total amount of the appropriation for "office of the assistant treasurer at Boston" from $35,560 to $36,060.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the "Office of assistant treasurer at Chicago," in line 1106, before the word "clerks," to strike out the word "two" and insert "three;" after the word "dollars," in line 1107, to insert "one janitor at $600;" and in line 1109, after the word "all," to strike out "twenty-one thousand four" and insert "twenty-three thousand two;" so as to make the clause read:

Office of assistant treasurer at Chicago: For assistant treasurer, $4,500; for cashier, $2,500; for paying-teller, $1,800; for book-keeper and receiving teller, at $1,500 each; two coin, coupon, and currency clerks, at $1,500 each; one assistant book-keeper and three clerks, at $1,200 each; for one messenger, $840; one janitor, at $600; and three watchmen, $720 each; in all, $23,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the "Office of assistant treasurer at San Francisco," in line 1193, after the words "assistant treasurer," to strike out "four" and insert "five;" in line 1194, after the word cashier," to strike out "two thousand five hundred" and insert "three thousand;" in line 1195, after the word "thousand," to insert "five hundred;" in line 1196, after the word "thousand," to insert "four hundred;" and in line 1203, after the word "all," to strike out "twenty-five thousand seven," and insert "twenty-eight thousand one;" so as to make the clause read:

Office of assistant treasurer at San Francisco: For assistant treasurer, $5,500; cashier, $3,000; book-keeper, $2,500; one chief clerk, $2,400; assistant cashier, $2,000; receiving-teller, $2,000; assistant book-keeper, $2,000; coin-teller, $1,800; one clerk, $1,800; one clerk, $1,400; one messenger, $840; and four watchmen, at $720 each: in all, $28,120.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1216, after the word "others," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "twenty-eight;" so as to make the clause read:

For engraving, printing, finishing, and binding interest, transfer, redemption, pension, and other checks and drafts, including cost of paper for the same, for the use of the Treasurer of the United States, assistant treasurers, pension agents, disbursing officers, and others, $28,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "United States mints and assay offices," in the appropriations for the "office of the Director," in line 1224, after the words "class two," to insert "one of whom shall be a stenographer;" so as to read:

Two clerks of class 2, one of whom shall be a stenographer.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the "mint at San Francisco, Cal.," in line 1267, to increase the appropriation for the compensation of "assistant assayer, assistant melter and refiner, and assistant coiner," from $2,000 each to $2,500 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1275, to increase the total amount of the appropriations for the salary of superintendent, assayer, melter and refiner and coiner, &c., at the mint at San Francisco, from $41,900 to $43,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the "mint at Denver, Colo.," in line 1320, after the word "dollars," to strike out "and hereafter the mint at Denver, Colo., shall be designated 'assay office at Denver, Colo.'"

The next amendment was, under the head of "Government in the Territories," in line 1393, before the words "associate judges," to strike out "three" and insert "five;" and in line 1395, before the word "thousand," to strike out "sixteen" and insert "twenty-two;" so as to make the clause read:

Territory of Dakota: For salary of governor, $2,600; chief-justice and five associate judges, at $3,000 each; and secretary, at $1,800, $22,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1403, to increase the appropriation for "legislative expenses" of the Territory of Dakota from $26,029.60 to $38,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriation for the "Territory of Alaska," in line 1503, after the word "thousand," to insert "five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

Territory of Alaska:
For salary of governor, $3,000; judge, $3,000; attorney, marshal, and clerk, $2,500 each; four commissioners, $1,000 each; four deputy marshals, $750 each; in all, $20,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1509, before the word "contingent," to insert "incidental and;" and after the word "governor," in line 1511, to insert "two thousand;" so as to read:

For incidental and contingent expenses of the Territory, to be expended under the direction of the governor, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "War Department," in line 1519, after the words "class two," to strike out "twenty-eight" and insert "twenty-nine;" in line 1520, after the words "class one," to strike out "seven" and insert "eight;" and in line 1526, before the word "hundred," to strike out "nine thousand seven" and insert "eleven thousand nine;" so as to read:

WAR DEPARTMENT.

For compensation of the Secretary of War, $8,000; one chief clerk, at $2,750; one disbursing clerk, at $2,000; one stenographer, at $1,800; three chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; five clerks of class 4; seven clerks of class 3; eight clerks of class 2; twenty-nine clerks of class 1; eight clerks, at $1,000 each; four messengers; six assistant messengers; eight laborers; carpenter, $1,000; foreman of laborers, $1,000; one hostler, $600; two hostlers, at $540 each; and one watchman, at $540, in all; $111,930.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that the semicolon after the word "all," in line 1525, should come after the word "dollars."

Mr. ALLISON. I agree. Strike out the semicolon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so modified, there being no objection. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 1546, to insert:

For the following additional clerks in the Office of the Adjutant-General, for the sole purpose of completing the regimental registers of the volunteer forces of the several States during the late war, namely: One clerk of class 4; three clerks of class 3; six clerks of class 2; and twelve clerks of class 1; in all, $29,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Immediately after the amendment which has just been agreed to, I move to add:

For the hire of a suitable building, for heating the same, and for the purchase of the necessary desks, chairs, stationery, &c., in order to enable the Secretary of War to carry forward expeditiously the work of completing the volunteer registers of regiments, $3,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 1576.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Iowa, in line 1571, to the word "of." Should it not be "as?"

Mr. ALLISON. It should be. I will move that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be agreed to, there being no objection.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 1579.

Mr. PENDLETON. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa who has charge of the bill whether the amount of $45,000 appropriated here for the office of the Chief of the Signal Service embraces all the appropriation that is made for the service in all the appropriation bills?

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that this is simply for the clerical force in the office of the Chief Signal Officer.

Mr. PENDLETON. The clerical force?

Mr. ALLISON. The clerical force I believe is all that is included here. The main appropriation for the Signal Service is found in the sundry civil bill, which has not yet been reported to the Senate.

Mr. PENDLETON. Can the Senator from Iowa inform the Senate what is the total amount appropriated in all the appropriation bills for the performance of the service in that bureau?

Mr. ALLISON. I can not accurately state it at this moment.

Mr. PLUMB. It is about $600,000.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly as much as $600,000. My impression is that it is between $800,000 and $900,000, but I would not like to undertake to state accurately, because I have not the figures before me.

Mr. PENDLETON. In what appropriation bill is it that the chief expenses of that office are provided for?

Mr. ALLISON. They are found in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. PENDLETON. Are the details of the appropriations made in that bill?

Mr. ALLISON. The appropriations are made now with pretty full details. Formerly the appropriations were made in a lump, but last year we required careful detailed estimates to be made of the expenditures of the Signal Service. Although I have not had time to examine it carefully, I think the appropriation bill as sent to us from the House appropriates for that bureau in considerable detail.

Mr. PENDLETON. Will the Senator be kind enough to inform me, if he can, where I can lay my hand upon the statutes, the provisions of law which regulate the service of that bureau?

Mr. ALLISON. It would be very difficult for me to do so. The Signal Service is very much like Topsy; it has "grown up." I do not think it ever was established by law in the sense that a bureau is established by law. It has grown up as a growth of the war, and has been gradually enlarged and amplified until a few years ago, I believe in an appropriation bill, we authorized the appointment of a brigadier-general as the head of it, General Myer, who had been for a long time in the Signal Service. He was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general by virtue of a statute passed three or four years ago. I think that is all the law there is on the subject except what is contained in the appropriation acts.

Mr. PENDLETON. The Senator will doubtless remember that some comment was made in another place a few years ago, or a few months ago perhaps, in relation to the expenditures for traveling expenses of the officers of the bureau and in relation to the printing expenses of the persons connected with that office. I do not see any appropriation of that kind here, and I have no desire specially to ask the Senator to-day about these other matters. If he can indicate upon what bill we may find special provisions made for expenditures in that bureau, I am perfectly willing to defer any suggestions that I may have to make on the subject, but if he prefers it I should like to ask him some questions either to-day or hereafter, when the subject is more properly before the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Ohio will defer that class of questions, as all those expenses are appropriated for in the sundry civil bill. The committee will endeavor to examine into the different items of expense so as to furnish full information respecting the matter.

Mr. PENDLETON. I do not know that any of the items relating to the Signal Service in this or any other bill which will be reported are not entirely unobjectionable, but I have been looking a little over the statutes to see the organization of the bureau. It seems to have spread itself out in many directions, for if I am not mistaken very much that bureau had a great deal to do with fitting out an expedition into the north seas last year. I find it very difficult in the Revised Statutes or any other place to trace up the various powers belonging to that bureau.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator refer to the Howgate expedition?

Mr. PENDLETON. It was an expedition in search of somebody, I do not know whether it was the Howgate expedition or not.

Mr. MORGAN. Howgate has not been found yet, I believe.

Mr. ALLISON. The appropriations for the Signal Service will be found, as I said to the Senator, in the sundry civil bill. I have the House print of that bill before me now, and I find that as it came from the House the total amount as footed up by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] is $624,000. However, I will say that from several letters received and from sundry indications, I think it is expected that the sum will be somewhat enlarged when the bill comes into the Senate. But all the details are found in that bill. I commend it to the Senator, and I hope he will defer special inquiries until we have had an opportunity of examining the matter.

Mr. PENDLETON. I shall do so in deference to the Senator's wish. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think it would be a good thing to have a codification of all the provisions of law in relation to the establishment of that bureau, and whether either the War Department or some committee of the Senate had not better be charged with the duty by the next session of collating those laws.

Mr. ALLISON. I think that would be a very wise thing to do. It would take very little time, I think, and very little space.

Mr. PENDLETON. Perhaps very little space, but I am inclined to think from the examination I have made it would take a good deal of time.

Mr. ALLISON. Very likely.

Mr. PENDLETON. I should like to ask another question in connection with the subject, whether these appropriations have not swelled year by year to such an amount as that it would perhaps be a good thing to have a separate appropriation bill for the Signal Service Bureau as we have for the Military Academy and various other establishments.

Mr. ALLISON. I think not. I will state to the Senator that these appropriations have been diminished in the last few years rather than increased. It is only last year and this year, if my memory serves me, that we have appropriated at all in detail for the Signal Service. We were in the habit of making a lump appropriation, and the amount was expended according to the wisdom and discretion of the officer at the head of that bureau, except as supervised by the Secretary of War.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. PENDLETON. In one moment. I wish to call attention to one other thing, and then I shall yield with great pleasure. I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to page 191 of the estimates of appropriations for this year, in which I find a statement that the aggregate of estimates for the Signal Service is $1,368,645, and some items are given of the general amounts that go to make up that sum. I have no desire to press the subject at this moment if the Senator prefers that his attention should be called to it when the sundry civil bill is under consideration; but having noticed this estimate of appropriation, as the statement of the Senator from Iowa prompted by the Senator from Kansas is that it is about $600,000, I call his attention to a discrepancy of some $700,000, not with a view of asking any explanation at this time but so that we may have it explained hereafter.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state in response to the Senator from Ohio, however, that the amount estimated is not a very clear indication of the amount to be appropriated as these bills come to us.

Mr. PENDLETON. That is clear.

Mr. ALLISON. Nor is it a very fair indication of what the Senate Committee on Appropriations will be likely to report. Of course the Signal Service is like a good many other branches of the service in our Government; those at the head are quite willing to amplify and draw into their bureau or Department a good many things that Congress is not in the habit of appropriating for. I promise the Senator to look into it with great care and will try to give him full information of the details.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like the Senator to inquire at the same time, if it would not put him to too much trouble, as to what Department of the Government the Signal Service Bureau is amenable to. I have been informed that the chief of the bureau is not a military officer in the sense that he is amenable to the rules and regulations for the government of the Army; that he is a civil officer with a military title. I should like very much to know the exact status of that bureau in relation to the Departments of the Government.

Mr. ALLISON. I suppose that the chief of the Signal Service is a military officer, and I suppose he would be amenable to the Articles of War, whatever they are.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that he is not.

Mr. ALLISON. He is appropriated for as a brigadier-general and considered to be a brigadier-general in one of the staff corps of the Army; but I can not lay my hand now upon the precise law that governs his appointment and his status in the War Department. I am quite sure he is in the War Department or is so considered.

Mr. BUTLER. I have been informed that he is not liable to court-martial and that he is not governed by the rules and regulations for the government of the Army. That has been my information; I do not know how correct it is. I should like the Senator, while looking into that bureau, to have an eye to that question also.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall also have an eye to that question, and I will consult with the Military Committee and the Judiciary Committee to ascertain what their construction may be of the existing statutes on this subject.

Mr. BUTLER. It might be a very important matter to have that determined with reference to the very question of responsibility in the disbursement of the money appropriated by Congress.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall look into it.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the items for "the office of the Quartermaster-General," in line 1605, before the word "subsistence," to strike out "for" and insert "in lieu of;" in line 1606, after the word "duty," to insert "at a rate to be fixed by the Secretary of War, not exceeding $3 per day;" so as to make the clause read:

For per diem, in lieu of subsistence of the agents employed while traveling on duty, at a rate to be fixed by the Secretary of War, not exceeding $3 per day, and for actual necessary expenses for transportation, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "the office of the Chief of Engineers," in line 1664, after the word "exceed," to strike out "fifty-two" and insert "fifty-six;" so as to make the clause read:

And the services of skilled draughtsmen, civil engineers, and such other services as the Secretary of War may deem necessary may be employed in the office of the Chief of Engineers to carry into effect the various appropriations for rivers and harbors, fortifications, and surveys of military defenses, to be paid for from such appropriations: Provided, That the expenditures on this account for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, shall not exceed $56,000; and that the Secretary of War shall each year, in the annual estimates, report to Congress the number of persons so employed, and the amount paid to each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "the Office of Publication of Records of the Rebellion," in line 1671, after the words "two clerks," to strike out "at $1,000 each" and insert "of class 1;" so as to read:

Two clerks of class 1.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 1671 I move to strike out "two" and insert "three," these clerks being all of the same grade; so as to read:

Three clerks of class 1.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This amendment will be treated as a modification of the amendment reported by the committee, so as to read "three clerks of class 1." The question is on the amendment as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 1678, to increase the total appropriation for the "Office of Publication of Records of the Rebellion" from $30,680 to $31,080.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to insert there $32,280 as the total.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 1700, to increase the total amount of the appropriations "for contingent expenses of the Secretary of War and the bureaus, buildings (except the War Department building), and offices of the War Department," &c., from $60,120 to $63,620.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "public buildings and grounds," in line 1734, after the word "at," to strike out "six hundred and sixty," and insert "seven hundred and twenty;" and in line 1735, after the word "thousand," to strike out "three hundred and twenty" and insert "four hundred and forty;" so as to make the clause read:

For two night watchmen in Smithsonian Grounds, at $720 each, $1,440.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1743, after "Washington Circle," to insert "one for Du Pont Circle;" in line 1748, after the word "reservations," to strike out "seven" and insert "eight;" and, in line 1749, after the word "each," to strike out "four thousand six hundred and twenty" and insert "five thousand two hundred and eighty;" so as to make the clause read:

For one watchman for Iowa Circle; one watchman for Fourteenth Street Circle and neighboring reservations; one for Rawlins Square and Washington Circle; one for Du Pont Circle; one for McPherson and Farragut Squares; one for Stanton Place and neighboring reservations; one for Armory Square and reservations east to Botanical Garden; one for Mount Vernon Square and adjacent reservations; eight in all, at $660 each, $5,280.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1752, to increase the appropriation "for one night watchman for Armory Square and reservations east to Botanic Garden," from $660 to $720.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out lines 1754 and 1755, as follows:

For one bridge-keeper at Chain Bridge, $660.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope that amendment will not be agreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, in the appropriation for the "State, War, and Navy Department building," in line 1765, before the word "watchmen," to strike out "forty-five" and insert "fifty-seven;" in line 1770, before the word "charwomen," to strike out "fifty-six" and insert "fifty-four;" and after the word "all," in line 1771, to strike out "eighty-three thousand eight hundred and twenty" and insert "ninety-two thousand one hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

State, War, and Navy Department building: Office of the superintendent: One clerk, class 1; one chief engineer, at $1,200; six assistant engineers, at $1,000 each; one captain of the watch, $1,200; two lieutenants of the watch, at $840 each; fifty-seven watchmen; one machinist, at $900; two skilled laborers, at $720 each; seventeen firemen; six conductors of the elevator, at $720 each; sixteen laborers; one laborer, at $600; and fifty-four charwomen, at $180 each; in all, $92,100.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the "Navy Department," in line 1782, after the word "dollars," to insert "one stenographer at $1,400;" in line 1784, before the word "clerks," to strike out "two" and insert "three;" in the same line, after the words "class two," to strike out "six" and insert "five;" in line 1791, after the words "class two," to strike out "who shall be a stenographer;" and in line 1794, after the word "all," to strike out "fifty-six thousand" and insert "fifty-seven thousand six hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

Navy Department: For compensation of the Secretary of the Navy, $8,000; for compensation of chief clerk of the Navy Department, $2,500; one disbursing clerk, $2,250; five clerks of class 4; three clerks of class 3; one stenographer, at $1,600; one stenographer, at $1,400; three clerks of class 2; five clerks of class 1; four clerks at $1,000 each; telegraph operator, at $1,000; one carpenter, $1,000; two messengers; three assistant messengers; one messenger boy, at $420; one messenger boy, at $240; three laborers; one clerk of class 2, and one laborer (for inspection board); one clerk of class 2 (for examining and retiring); one clerk of class 1; and one assistant messenger (in care of library); in all, $57,610.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the "Nautical Almanac Office," after the word "at," at the end of line 1819, to strike out "four hundred and eighty" and insert "seven hundred and twenty;" in line 1821, after the word "dollars," to insert "one laborer;" and in the same line, after the word "all," to strike out "fourteen thousand four" and insert "fifteen thousand three;" so as to make the clause read:

Nautical Almanac Office: For the following assistants, namely: Three at $1,600 each; two at $1,400 each; three at $1,200 each; two at $1,000 each; one assistant messenger; and one copyist at $720; one laborer; in all, $15,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the "Hydrographic Office," in line 1827, after the word "for," to strike out "chief of engraving and draughting, $2,400;" in line 1829, after the words "class two," to insert "one clerk of class 1;" and in line 1831, after the word "all," to strike out "six thousand three" and insert "five thousand one;" so as to make the clause read:

Hydrographic Office: For two clerks of class 2; one clerk of class 1; one assistant messenger; and one office attendant, $420; in all, $5,140.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1835, to increase the appropriation "for draughtsmen, engravers, copyists, copper-plate printers, printers' apprentices, and laborers in the Hydrographic Office" from $32,660 to $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out lines 1837 to 1841, inclusive, as follows:

For purchase of chart-paper, copper plates, printing material, and foreign hydrographic works; photolithographing charts, repairs to printing-presses, and engraving and drawing outside of Hydrographic Office, $20,000.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For purchase of chart-paper, copper plates, electrotyping copper plates; ink and other materials necessary in printing division; materials for drawing division and for mounting charts; materials for engravers; for photolithographing charts for immediate use, and transfer of photolithographic and other charts to copper; repairs to printing-presses and purchase of new hydraulic press; for extra drawing and engraving, and for purchase of foreign charts and hydrographic works for the use of the vessels of the Navy; for the purchase of drawing-paper, drawing-materials, and necessary instruments to be furnished naval vessels while surveying, and for repair of such instruments, $20,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1854, to insert:

For new edition of Maury's pilot chart, $3,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1856, to insert:

For the purchase of instruments for a systematic examination of the currents of the ocean by the steam merchant marine, $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1866, after the word "thousand," to strike out "charts" and insert "dollars;" so as to read:

Contingent expenses of branch offices at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, New Orleans, and San Francisco, including furniture, fuel, lights, and care of offices, car-fare and ferriage in visiting merchant vessels, freight, express, telegrams, and other necessary expenses incurred in collecting the latest nautical information for the pilot charts, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the "Naval Observatory," in line 1868, after the words "assistant astronomers" to strike out "four thousand nine" and insert "one at $2,100 and two at $1,800 each, five thousand seven;" in line 1872, after the word "dollars," to insert "two computers, at $1,200 each;" and in line 1876, after the word "all," to strike out "seventeen thousand four" and insert "twenty thousand six;" so as to make the clause read:

Naval Observatory: For pay of three assistant astronomers, one at $2,100 and two at $1,800 each, $5,700; one clerk of class 4; one instrument-maker, $1,500; two computers, at $1,200 each; four watchmen, including one for new Naval Observatory grounds; two skilled laborers, one at $1,000 and one at $720, and seven laborers; in all, $20,620.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 1896.

Mr. PLUMB. I notice the item of "gas," and then again "for lights," in various Departments and offices in the city of Washington. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether he knows the price paid for gas; whether it contemplates the price paid by private consumers or not; whether it is in the discretion of the persons having charge of these various contingent funds. I speak of this because in the sundry civil bill the price is fixed for the care of lamps in the various parks and public places in the city. I desire to know if we have any uniform rate at which gas is paid for in the city of Washington?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know whether there is a uniform rate applied to all the Departments. I happen to know that the gas bills in some of the Departments are pretty high. This item of expenditure is under the disbursing officers of the different Departments, of course, and I should suppose that the rate per thousand feet would be the same to all, but I am not advised as to that. That of course can be ascertained by a careful examination of the expense account. I know the Postmaster-General said to me the other day that he thought the bills for gas in the Post-Office Department were very high. Those bills have not been paid I believe for the last four months, and for that reason he had some occasion to examine into them.

Mr. PLUMB. I call the attention of the Senator to that not because I design now to move any amendment, but I notice in various places here there are large sums of money for lights under miscellaneous expenses, and they are large enough to a person unaccustomed to very large expenditures to cause inquiry, and in view of some of the recent developments also to a suspicion in my mind that perhaps some of these sums might be diminished.

I call the attention of the chairman of the committee now to this point because the sundry civil bill, in which there is an appropriation made for gas for the public squares and parks of the city, is to be considered by the committee, and I make the suggestion that possibly in that bill there may be some limitation placed on these various expenditures for gas which would conduce to economy and to the diminution of expense.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading will be proceeded with.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations for the "Bureau of Ordnance," Navy Department, in line 1900, after the words "class two," to insert "one clerk of class 1;" and in line 1902, after the word "all," to strike out "eight thousand nine" and insert "ten thousand one;" so as to make the clause read:

Bureau of Ordnance: For chief clerk, $1,800; draughtsman, $1,800; one clerk of class 3; one clerk of class 2; one clerk of class 1; one clerk, at $1,000; one assistant messenger; and one laborer; in all, $10,180.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "Bureau of Medicine and Surgery," Navy Department, in line 1930, after the word "one," to strike out "assistant chemist" and insert "laborer;" so as to make the clause read:

Bureau of Medicine and Surgery: For chief clerk, $1,800; one clerk of class 3; one clerk of class 2; one clerk of class 1; one clerk, at $1,000; one assistant messenger; and one laborer; one janitor, $600; one laborer, $480 (for naval dispensary); in all, $9,460.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the Office of the "Judge-Advocate-General, United States Navy," in line 1934, after the word "for," to insert "one clerk of class four;" in line 1935, after the words "class one," to strike out "one clerk, at one thousand dollars;" and in line 1936, after the word "all," to strike out "five thousand six" and insert "six thousand four;" so as to make the clause read:

Judge-Advocate-General, United States Navy:
For one clerk of class 4; one clerk of class 3; two clerks of class 1; one laborer; in all, $6,460.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1937, to insert:

For the compilation of the naval records of the war of the rebellion: For one agent for the collection of confederate naval records, $1,800; one clerk, at $1,000; in all, $2,800.

For traveling expenses of agent, freight, expressage, postage, and other necessary expenses, $1,000: Provided, That said agent shall be allowed while traveling on duty a per diem in lieu of subsistence at a rate, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Navy, not exceeding $3 per day and for actual necessary expenses of transportation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1955, after the word "officers," to strike out "eleven thousand" and insert "thirteen thousand nine hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For stationery, furniture, newspapers, plans, drawings, drawing materials, freight, expressage, postage, and other absolutely necessary expenses of the Navy Department and its various bureaus and offices, $13,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1956, to insert:

For rent of rooms for use of the presses used for hydrographic printing, $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to insert there:

For removal and resetting of said presses, $1,000.

The Secretary of the Navy in a letter informs the committee that it will require a thousand dollars to remove and reset these presses.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations for the "Department of the Interior," in line 1962, after the word "dollars," to strike out:

Second Assistant Secretary, $3,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1965, after the word "building," to insert:

Three members of the board of pension appeals, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, at $2,500 each.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate" and inserting "by the Secretary of the Interior."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I move to strike out the word "the," before the word "board," in line 1966, and insert "a;" so as to read:

Three members of a board of pension appeals.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the compensation allowed to the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, $4,000. Ought not that to be equal to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, $4,500? The Commissioner of Indian Affairs has $4,500 by this bill.

Mr. ALLISON. The Assistant Secretary now receives the compensation here named, and we heard no suggestion with reference to it and made no amendment regarding it.

Mr. LOGAN. There has been no suggestion about it, but on accout of the increase in the other offices I thought it would be fair to allow $4,500 to him.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator can call attention to it afterward.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; I will wait till the reading of the bill is through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment as amended in lines 1965 to 1968.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 1980, after the word "dollars," to insert:

One female clerk to sign land patents, $1,200.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to amend that by adding after the word "clerk" the words "to be designated by the President."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 1994, to increase the total amount of the appropriation for compensation of the Secretary of the Interior, Assistant Secretary, and the clerks and employés in the office of the Secretary from $147,730 to $152,930.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the General Land Office, in line 2005, to increase the appropriation for salary of the "Commissioner of the General Land Office" from $4,000 to $4,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "dollars," in line 2006, to insert:

One assistant commissioner, who shall be authorized to sign such letters, papers, and documents, and to perform such other duties as may be directed by the Commissioner, and shall act as Commissioner in the absence of that officer or in case of a vacancy in the office of Commissioner, $3,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to insert "to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 2012, after the word "dollars," to strike out:

Law clerk, $2,000.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Two law clerks, at $2,000 each; two examiners of office decisions, at $2,000 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2018, after the word "each," to strike out "three principal clerks, at $1,800 each," and in lieu thereof to insert:

Ten chiefs of division (three of whom shall be in lieu of the three principal clerks now authorized by law), at $2,000 each.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to insert there "and to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior," striking out in line 2017 "to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior," and inserting it below. It is a mere transposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The suggestion of the Senator from Iowa will be regarded as a modification of the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to insert in line 2022:

And the additional law clerk, examiners, and chiefs of divisions shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior.

So that there shall be no question about it.

Mr. PLATT. Let the whole paragraph be read as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment as it will read if amended as proposed.

The Secretary read as follows:

Three inspectors of surveyors-general and district land offices, at $2,000 each; ten chiefs of division (three of whom shall be in lieu of the three principal clerks now authorized by law), at $2,000 each; to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior. And the additional law clerk, examiners, and chief of division shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. The Chair will excuse me if there is a little confusion about this. It arises from the fact that three principal clerks who are converted into chiefs of division are now appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Therefore it is important to insert the words I have just asked to have inserted. But the three inspectors of surveyors-general and district land offices are now appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and having struck out the words "to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior," I am afraid there might be some confusion in reference to them. Therefore I ask that by unanimous consent those words may be restored in line 2017.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the vote by which the amendment was made is reconsidered.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 2022, after the word "each," to strike out "thirty-three" and insert "thirty-eight;" so as to read:

Thirty-eight clerks of class 4.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2023, before the word "clerks," to strike out "forty-six" and insert "sixty-six;" so as to read:

Sixty-six clerks of class 3.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2023, after the word "three," to strike out "fifty-seven" and insert "seventy-seven;" so as to read:

Seventy-seven clerks of class 2.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2024, after the words "class two," to strike out "fifty-eight" and insert "seventy-eight;" so as to read:

Seventy-eight clerks of class 1.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2025, after the words "class one," to strike out "forty-seven" and insert "fifty-seven;" so as to read:

Fifty-seven clerks, at $1,000 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2026, before the word "copyists," to strike out "fifty-four" and insert "sixty-nine;" so as to read:

Sixty more copyists, at $900 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2029, to reduce the appropriation for compensation of "six packers" from $720 to $660 each.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope that amendment will not be agreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, in line 2031, to increase the total amount of the appropriation for the salary of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, assistant commissioner, and the clerks and employés in the General Land Office, from $417,650 to $557,890.

Mr. ALLISON. The amendment just made will require a change of footing. It should be $558,730 instead of $557,800.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 2033, after the word "for," to strike out "the actual expenses" and insert "per diem in lieu of subsistence;" in line 2034, after the word "inspectors," to strike out "while on duty;" after the word "misconduct," in line 2036, to insert "while traveling on duty, at a rate to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, not exceeding $3 per day, and for actual necessary expenses of transportation;" and in line 2040, after the word "dollars," to insert "to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior;" so as to make the clause read:

For per diem in lieu of subsistence of inspectors and of clerks detailed to investigate fraudulent land entries, trespasses on the public lands, and cases of official misconduct, while traveling on duty, at a rate to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, not exceeding $3 per day, and for actual necessary expenses of transportation, $10,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment in the appropriations for the "Indian Office," in line 2048, after the word "thousand," to insert "five hundred;" so as to read:

For compensation of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, $4,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 2050, I move to strike out "one chief" and insert "two chiefs," and in line 2051, after the word "dollars," to insert "each;" so as to read:

Two chiefs of division, at $2,000 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in the same clause, in line 2052, before the word "clerks," to strike out "three" and insert "four," after the word "four," at the end of the same line, to insert "one of whom shall have charge of the educational division;" after the word "division," in line 2053, to strike out "nine" and insert "eleven;" in line 2055, after the word "dollars," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "eighteen;" after the word "draughtsman," in line 2056, to strike out "eight" and insert "ten;" and in line 2057, after the words "class one," to strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen;" so as to read:

Indian Office: For compensation of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, $4,500; chief clerk, $2,000; one financial clerk, at $2,000; two chiefs of division, at $2,000; one principal book-keeper, $1,800; four clerks of class 4, one of whom shall have charge of the educational division; eleven clerks of class 3; one stenographer, at $1,600; eighteen clerks of class 2, one of whom shall be a draughtsman; ten clerks of class 1; fifteen clerks, at $1,000 each; fourteen copyists, at $900 each; one messenger, one assistant messenger, and one laborer.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to insert, after the words "assistant messenger," in line 2060, the words:

One messenger-boy, at $360 perannum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 2060, to change the total of the appropriations for compensation of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the clerks and employés in his office, from $88,620 to $105,720.

Mr. ALLISON. The total should be changed. Instead of "$105,720" it should be "$108,080," we having added $2,360 to the total. I move so to amend the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations for the "Pension Office," in line 2068, to increase the appropriation for compensation of "medical referee" from $2,500 to $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 2074.

Mr. MITCHELL. In line 2074 I move to strike out the word "one," where it occurs before the word "thousand," and insert in lieu thereof "two;" and after the word "thousand" to strike out "eight hundred;" so as to read:

Eighteen medical examiners, who shall be surgeons of education, skill, and experience in their profession, at $2,000 each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Pennsylvania that the Committee of the Whole is now acting upon amendments recommended by the Committee on Appropriations. His amendment will be in order when the bill has been gone through with.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator reserve his amendment for the time being?

Mr. MITCHELL. Very well.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 2077, before the words "principal examiners," to strike out "forty-five" and insert "fifty;" so as to read:

Fifty principal examiners for review board, at $2,000 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2080, before the word "clerks," to strike out "sixty-five" and insert "seventy;" so as to read:

Seventy clerks of class 4.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same line, after the word "four," to strike out "ninety-five" and insert "one hundred;" so as to read:

One hundred clerks of class 3.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2081, after the word "three," to strike out "three hundred and ninety" and insert "four hundred;" so as to read:

Four hundred clerks of class 2.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "two," in line 2082, to strike out "three hundred and fifty-eight" and "insert "four hundred;" so as to read:

Four hundred clerks of class 1.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "one," in line 2083, to strike out "ninety-five" and insert "two hundred and twenty;" so as to read:

Two hundred and twenty clerks, at $1,000 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2087, before the word "copyists," strike out "seventy-five" and insert "one hundred and thirty;" so as to read:

One hundred and thirty copyists, at $900 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2092, to increase the total amount of the appropriation for compensation of the Commissioner of Pensions, deputy commissioners, clerks, and employés in the Pension Office from $1,689,250 to $1,955,650.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 2094 to 2096, inclusive, as follows:

For per diem for traveling examiners, for subsistence, and for actual and necessary expenses for transportation and assistance, $360,000.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For per diem, in lieu of subsistence for traveling examiners while traveling on duty, at a rate to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, not exceeding $3 per day, and for actual necessary expenses for transportation, $360,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to insert the words "and assistance," in line 2101, after the word "transportation." Those words are in the original clause, and they ought to have been copied here.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 2108 to 2011, inclusive, as follows:

For per diem for one hundred and fifty additional special examiners above provided for, for subsistence, and for actual and necessary expenses for transportation, $220,000.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For per diem in lieu of subsistence for one hundred and fifty additional special examiners above provided for, while traveling on duty, at a rate to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, not exceeding $3 per day, and for actual necessary expenses for transportation, $220,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to insert after the word "transportation," in line 2116, the words "and assistance."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 2118 to 2128, inclusive, as follows:

That hereafter there shall not be allowed to any special agent of any of the Executive Departments, when they are actually engaged in traveling or absent from their posts of duty on the business of the Government, for subsistence and other actual and necessary expenses, not including transportation, any sum exceeding the amount actually expended, in no case to exceed $3 per day; and sworn itemized statements of such expenses shall be presented at the end of each month by each of said special examiners so engaged to the proper accounting officer of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the "United States Patent Office," in line 2130, to increase the appropriation for the "compensation of the Commissioner of the Patent Office" from $4,500 to $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk read the next item, in lines 2131 and 2132.

For assistant commissioner, $3,000.

Mr. LAPHAM. I desire to offer an amendment there, but I understand it is not in order now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not at this time, until the committee amendments shall have been acted on.

Mr. LAPHAM. Until the bill is completed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Until the committee amendments have been acted on. The bill will then be open to amendment generally.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 2133, after the word "dollars," to insert—

One law clerk, at $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2138, before the word "principal," to strike out "twenty-three" and insert "twenty-six;" so as to read:

Twenty-six principal examiners, at $2,400 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2140, before the words "first assistant," to strike out "twenty-six" and insert "thirty;" so as to read:

Thirty first assistant examiners, at $1,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2141, before the words "second assistant," to strike out "twenty-six" and insert "thirty-three;" so as to read:

Thirty-three second assistant examiners, at $1,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2143, before the words "third assistant," to strike out "twenty-six" and insert "forty;" so as to read:

Forty third assistant examiners, at $1,400 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2144, before the words "fourth assistant," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty;" so as to read:

Fifty fourth assistant examiners, at $1,200 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2151, after the word "each," to strike out "two" and insert "three;" and in the same line, after the word "four," to insert "one of whom shall act as application clerk;" so as to read:

Three clerks of class 4, one of whom shall act as application clerk.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2153, before the word "clerks," to strike out "four" and insert "seven;" so as to read:

Seven clerks of class 3, one of whom shall be translator of languages.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2154, after the word "languages," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty;" so as to read:

Twenty clerks of class 2.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2155, after the word "two," to strike out "forty-five" and insert "sixty;" so as to read:

Sixty clerks of class 1.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2165, before the word "skilled," to strike out "fifty-one" and insert "fifty-three;" so as to read:

Fifty-three skilled laborers, at $720 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2168, after the word "each," to insert:

Five laborers, at $360 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2169, to increase the total amount of the appropriation for the compensation of the Commissioner of Patents, assistant commissioner and the clerks and employés in the Patent Office, from $546,350 to $658,890.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2196, after the word "patents," to insert "and for expenses attending defense of suits instituted against the Commissioner of Patents;" so as to make the clause read:

For investigating the question of the public use or sale of inventions for two years or more prior to filing applications for patents, and for expenses attending defense of suits instituted against the Commissioner of Patents, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "Bureau of Education," in line 2210, after the word "messenger," to insert "one engineer and skilled laborer, at $900; one watchman;" and in line 2214, after the word "all," to strike out "forty-four thousand five hundred and eighty" and insert "forty-six thousand two hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

Bureau of Education: For the Commissioner of Education, $3,000; collector and compiler of statistics, $2,400; chief clerk, $1,800; two clerks of class 4; one statistician, $1,800; two clerks of class 3; one translator, $1,600; four clerks of class 2; six clerks of class 1; two clerks, at $1,000 each; seven copyists; two copyists, at $800 each; one copyist, $720; one assistant messenger; one engineer and skilled laborer, at $900; one watchman; two laborers; two laborers, at $480 each; one laborer, at $400; one laborer, at $360; in all, $46,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2222, to increase the appropriation "for collecting statistics for special reports and circulars of information" from $2,200 to $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the "office of Commissioner of Railroads," in line 2233, after the word "dollars," to strike out "one clerk of class 4," and insert "one assistant book-keeper, at $2,000;" and in line 2236, after the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "six;" so as to make the clause read:

Office of Commissioner of Railroads: For Commissioner, $4,500; book-keeper, $2,400; railroad engineer, $2,500; one assistant book-keeper, at $2,000; one clerk of class 3; one copyist; and one assistant messenger; in all $14,620.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the "Office of the Director of the Geological Survey," in line 2258, to reduce the appropriation for compensation of "chief clerk" from $2,400 to $2,200.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to insert "four" instead of "two."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the Senator proposes simply to disagree to the amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir; to disagree to the committee's amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state the reason so that the Senate may understand it.

Several SENATORS. It is not necessary; we understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the same clause, line 2260, to reduce the appropriation for compensation of "chief disbursing clerk" from $2,400 to $2,200.

Mr. LOGAN. I move in that case also that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the committee, leaving the amount as fixed by the House, $2,400 instead of $2,200.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations?

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 2270, to reduce the total amount of the appropriation for compensation of the Director of the Geological Survey, executive officer, and the clerks and employés in the office from $35,340 to $34,940.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to disagree to that amendment, so as to leave the aggregate amount as it was in the House bill, in order to correspond with the action already taken.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 2287.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to strike out that paragraph, with a view of inserting the amount there in line 2302. The clause reads:

For rent of suitable building for use of custodian, $360.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be regarded as agreed to, if there be no objection, and lines 2286 and 2287 will be stricken out.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 2299, after the words "for rent of," to strike out "a building" and insert "buildings;" in the same line, after the words "of the," to strike out "United States Geological Survey and Pension Office" and insert "Department of the Interior, in the discretion of the Secretary;" and in line 2301, after "Secretary," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "not exceeding twenty;" so as to make the clause read:

For rent of buildings for use of the Department of the Interior, in the discretion of the Secretary, not exceeding $20,000.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, I move to insert "three hundred and sixty" after the word "thousand," in line 2302; so as to read:

For rent of buildings for use of the Department of the Interior, in the discretion of the Secretary, not exceeding $20,360.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 2304, after the words "Pension Office," to insert "not exceeding;" so as to make the clause read:

For rent of additional buildings for use of the Pension Office, not exceeding $18,760.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I observe that on pages 94 and 95, so far as the Secretary has now read, there are appropriations in excess of $60,000 for rents. It appears to me that that amount is enormous. I can not say that it is excessive, because I do not know exactly the accommodations that are required, but it would be interesting to know from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations how much longer the Government is to be called upon to make these annual appropriations for this extraordinary amount of rent. I believe we have a building in process of construction for the use of the Pension Office to which a great many hundred thousands of dollars have been already appropriated, and which it is to be hoped will some time be completed. I hope the chairman will advise us as to what the situation is so far as the Government property is concerned.

Mr. ALLISON. In response to the suggestion made by the Senator from Kansas, I think I ought to say that the rent paid by the Interior Department seems exorbitant, as we provide here for $64,000 and upward of rent for the Interior Department. This of course is largely due to the force in the Pension Office. The building on the corner of Twelfth street and Pennsylvania avenue is rented for $16,000.

Mr. INGALLS. By the year or for a term?

Mr. ALLISON. All these rentals are by the year. It is so especially provided in the law. The Pension Bureau also has the building on the corner of Thirteenth street and Pennsylvania avenue, and I believe pays $16,000 per annum for that building. That also is rented from year to year.

Mr. INGALLS. The old newspaper office?

Mr. ALLISON. The old office of the Republican newspaper. The provision to be found in line 2302 is a proposition to rent what is known as the Hooe building, near the Ebbitt House. That is to be used, as provided in the House bill, by the Pension Office and Geological Survey; but the Committee on Appropriations, in looking over the enormous rents, believed that it was wise to allow the Secretary of the Interior in his discretion to make disposition of all these buildings.

As Senators will see, we have provided in the bill for a large increase of force in the Land Office, made necessary by the constantly accumulating business of that office; and if that force is to be finally provided for additional room will be required by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. We have also provided here a considerable increase for the Commissioner of Patents. The Commissioner of Patents informs us that this increase is absolutely necessary for the expeditious conduct of the business of his office, and the committee are satisfied that his statement is correct in this regard. The whole expense of the Patent Office is now paid by inventors, and a sum ranging from $75,000 to $100,000 additional. These various bureaus must be provided for outside of the Interior Department building for the present, although if we shall appropriate a sum sufficient to finish the third story of the Interior Department building known as the Patent Office building about one hundred clerks can be accommodated there.

Mr. INGALLS. When is the new pension building to be finished?

Mr. ALLISON. The new pension building in Judiciary Square is progressing, but not as rapidly, I think, as it ought to progress. We have now before us an estimate for an additional appropriation of $200,000 to complete that building and to furnish it, although when the building was authorized to be constructed it was stated that $450,000 would be sufficient to complete it.

Mr. INGALLS. How much has been spent on it?

Mr. ALLISON. There will have been spent to the end of the present fiscal year $450,000, or nearly that sum.

Mr. INGALLS. How much will be required to finish it?

Mr. ALLISON. Two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That includes the furnishing.

Mr. ALLISON. That includes, I believe, the furnishing, or at least what furniture will be required when the clerks are removed from the other buildings. When the Pension Office building is completed it will conveniently house 1,200 clerks, so that when that building is completed it is possible we can reduce these rentals by from $30,000 to $35,000 per annum. But we are confronted by the fact that after the large building which is now being constructed in Judiciary Square shall have been completed there will still be a necessity for a considerable sum annually for rentals for offices for the Interior Department.

I believe that is all I need say with reference to these rents.

Mr. INGALLS. These rents represent a capitalized sum of more than $2,000,000 at the rate that the Government is paying on its obligations. I doubt very much whether the property that we hire for which we pay these extraordinary sums is worth three-quarters of a million, certainly not to exceed $1,000,000; and yet we are paying every year at the rate of 3 per cent. the interest on more than $2,000,000. It appears to me that it would be very wise, and as a matter of economy judicious, for the Government to make such appropriations as are necessary to secure the requisite accommodations for the carrying on of its own executive business. I can not but think that these appropriations, while they are undoubtedly required and are indispensable in the current of public business, are extravagant and unwise.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 2306 and 2307, in the following words:

For rent of additional buildings for the use of the Patent-Office, $5,000.

Mr. INGALLS. Why is that stricken out? If additional buildings are required why should they not be allowed?

Mr. ALLISON. That item is included, as the Senator will see, in line 2302.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations for "surveyors-general and their clerks," in line 2315, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three" and insert "five," and in the same line, after the word "all," to strike out "five" and insert "seven;" so as to make the clause read:

For surveyor-general of the Territory of Arizona, $2,500; and for the clerks in his office, $5,000; in all, $7,500.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Iowa to line 2313. The word "of" is omitted after the word "Territory."

Mr. ALLISON. That is a misprint.

Mr. INGALLS. It is no print at all.

Mr. ALLISON. Well, it is an omission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The word "of" will be inserted. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the amendment reported by the committee?

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 2328, after the words "surveyor-general of," to strike out "Minnesota and;" in line 2330, after the word "office," to strike out "fourteen thousand nine hundred" and insert "ten thousand;" and in line 2331, after the word "all," to strike out "seventeen thousand four" and insert "twelve thousand five;" so as to make the clause read:

For surveyor-general of the Territory of Dakota, $2,500; and for the clerks in his office, $10,000; in all, $12,500.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The business of the office of the surveyor-general of Dakota is very large. I observe that the committee recommend to reduce the sum appropriated for clerk-hire from $14,900 to $10,000.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will see that in the paragraph as the bill came from the House, Minnesota and Dakota were consolidated.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I see.

Mr. ALLISON. We strike out Minnesota, and that State is provided for elsewhere.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 2343, to insert:

For surveyor-general of Minnesota, $2,000; and for the clerks in his office, $8,000; in all, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2349, before the word "thousand," to strike out "eight" and insert "ten;" and in the same line, after the word "all," to strike out "ten" and insert "twelve;" so as to make the clause read:

For surveyor-general of the Territory of Montana, $2,500; and for the clerks in his office, $10,000; in all, $12,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2359, after the word "office," to strike out "six thousand" and insert "seven thousand five hundred;" and in line 2360, after the word "all," to strike out "eight thousand five hundred" and insert "ten thousand;" so as to make the clause read:

For surveyor-general of the Territory of New Mexico, $2,500; and for the clerks in his office, $7,500; in all, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2362, after the word "office," to strike out "four" and insert "five;" and in line 2363, after the word "all," to strike out "seven" and insert "eight;" so as to make the clause read:

For surveyor-general of Oregon, $2,500; and for the clerks in his office, $5,500; in all, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2368, after the word "thousand," to insert "five hundred;" and in line 2370, after the word "thousand," to insert "five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For surveyor-general of the Territory of Washington, $2,500; and for the clerks in his office, $5,500; in all $8,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the appropriations for the "Post-Office Department," in line 2378, to increase the appropriation for compensation of the "chief clerk to the Postmaster-General" from $2,200 to $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2380, to reduce the appropriation for compensation of the "appointment clerk" from $1,800 to $1,400.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I desire to oppose that amendment. I hope the Senate will disagree to the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that the committee proposed this amendment at the suggestion of the Postmaster-General. We find on further examination that this is a faithful officer. The reason which the Postmaster-General gave for this reduction, as we supposed, was that owing to the fact that the Civil Service Commission now provided for all the appointments we could reduce the compensation of the appointment clerk; but on further examination we found that the appointment clerks are kept pretty busy, and generally are old clerks. As we have not reduced any of the others we thought it was inexpedient to reduce this one. Therefore I concur with the Senator from Maine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the amendment reported by the committee?

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 2384, after the word "dollars," to strike out:

One clerk (Jennie M. Hunt), at $1,000.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether striking out those words will make it necessary to increase the number of clerks by one? Is there the same number of clerks that there would be if she were not taken out of the number appropriated for and put in specifically?

Mr. ALLISON. I so understand, and that it is not necessary. Jennie M. Hunt is now employed in the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. DAWES. The same number is appropriated for there that would be appropriated for if she was not taken out?

Mr. ALLISON. That I understand to be so.

Mr. INGALLS. Will she still be retained if the amendment of the committee is agreed to?

Mr. DAWES. It is expected that she will be retained, but if the number of clerks has been made one less in the Third Assistant Postmaster-General's Office on account of her having been put in here, then if you strike her out here you must increase the number in the Third Assistant's office.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand the suggestion of the Senator.

Mr. INGALLS. A clerk who has such exceptional value as to be specifically designated by name in the appropriation bill it appears to me ought not to be thus lightly dealt with. I hope we shall have some specific and definite information on this subject before we are called upon to agree with the committee.

Mr. DAWES. It was not the committee that put the name in specifically.

Mr. INGALLS. But the committee propose to strike her name out.

Mr. DAWES. They propose to conform to the uniform custom. The Senator is troubled to death because her name was put in specifically. I suggest to the Senator that he make the inquiry of the House which put her name in specifically.

Mr. ALLISON. It is not necessary to change the number, I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts. In response to the Senator from Kansas I will say that this lady is now employed in the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. INGALLS. And will probably continue to be employed?

Mr. ALLISON. I think so.

Mr. DAWES. It is due to the lady that some one should state that she is a cripple and has suffered by a fall in the elevator. It was from the kindest possible motive on the part of those in the House who put in her name here. It was ascertained afterward that it was not necessary, and that she would be provided for in the Department without any specific designation of her in the appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the amendment reported by the committee?

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 2387, to reduce the total amount of the appropriation for compensation of the Postmaster-General and the clerks and employés in his office from $30,760 to $29,660.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that this general aggregate will have to be changed by reason of disagreeing to the previous amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. It should be $30,060.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection that amendment will be agreed to, and the amendment as amended will be agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations for the office of the "First Assistant Postmaster-General," in line 2393, to increase the appropriation for compensation of "chief of salary and allowance division" from $2,000 to $2,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2394, after the word "dollars," to strike out "one clerk of class 4" and in lieu thereof to insert "chief of bond division, $2,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2407, to increase the total amount of the appropriation for compensation of the First Assistant Postmaster-General and the clerks and employés in his office from $100,060 to $106,100.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same clause, to strike out the following proviso from line 2409 to line 2414:

Provided, That three of the clerks at $1,000 each, and four of the laborers provided for above shall be paid from the appropriation made for stationery in the act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year 1885.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the office of the "Third Assistant Postmaster-General," in line 2435, before the word "female," to strike out "ten" and insert "eight;" so as to read:

Eight female clerks, at $1,200 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "each," in line 2436, to insert:

One female principal clerk, to correct errors and supply deficiences in the addresses of letters, and to decipher illegible superscriptions, $1,400; one female clerk in charge of the foreign branch of the dead-letter office, $1,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2446, to increase the total amount of the appropriation for compensation of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General and the clerks and employés in his office from $230,380 to $230,780.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 2447, to insert:

To enable the Postmaster-General to employ an agent and necessary assistants to supervise the manufacture and distribution of post-office envelopes, a sum not exceeding $3,000, to be paid from the appropriation "for registered-package envelopes, locks, and seals, and for office envelopes and for dead-letter envelopes," in the Post-Office appropriation act for the fiscal year, 1885.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the office of "superintendent of the money-order system," in line 2472, before the word "laborers," to strike out "eight" and insert "ten;" and in line 2473, after the word "all," to strike out "seventy-one thousand eight hundred and forty" and insert "seventy-three thousand one hundred and sixty;" so as to make the clause read:

For superintendent of the money-order sytem, $3,500; chief clerk, $2,000; six clerks of class 4; eight clerks of class 3; five clerks of class 2; ten clerks of class 1; six clerks, at $1,000 each; five clerks, at $900 each; one assistant messenger; one engineer, $1,000; two firemen; four watchmen; one conductor of elevator, $720; four charwomen, at $180 each; one female laborer, $480; and ten laborers; in all, $73,160.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 2509.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to line 2506, "nineteen watchmen, twenty laborers, one plumber, $900." The Chair suggests that the word "each" should be inserted to make it conform to the rest of the bill. The sum allowed to the twenty laborers does not appear to be mentioned.

Mr. ALLISON. It is not necessary to repeat the sum given to the laborers for the reason that in the latter part of the bill the price paid laborers is stated. I suppose the twenty laborers are included in the footing. I have not examined it.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Judicial," in the appropriations for the "Office of the Attorney-General," in line 2559, before the word "copyists," to strike out "seven" and insert "eleven;" and, after the word "copyists," to strike out "one messenger" and insert "two messengers;" so as to read:

Eleven copyists, two messengers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2562, to increase the appropriation for compensation of "one engineer" from $1,000 to $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 2566.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 2565, before the word "firemen," I move to strike out "two" and insert "three;" so as to read:

And three firemen.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 2566, to increase the total amount of the appropriation for compensation of the Attorney-General, Solicitor-General, assistant attorneys-general, solicitor of internal revenue, and the clerks and employés in the office of the Attorney-General from $111,390 to $116,030.

Mr. ALLISON. On account of the amendment just made the total should be changed so as to read "$116,750."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 2569, after the word "thousand," to insert "five hundred;" in line 2573, before the word "hundred," to strike out "five" and insert "nine;" and in line 2577, after the word "all," to strike out "eleven thousand six hundred" and insert "twelve thousand five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For contingent expenses of the Department, namely: For furniture and repairs, $1,500; for law and miscellaneous books for library of the Department, $1,500; to supply deficiencies in sets of State statutes, $500; for stationery, $1,900; for miscellaneous expenditures, such as telegraphing, postage, fuel, lights, labor, and other necessaries, including ordinary repairs of building and care of grounds, $7,160; in all, $12,560.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2580, to increase the appropriations "for care and subsistence of horses, purchase of new horses, and repairs of wagons and harness," from $1,200 to $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the "United States courts," after line 2630, to insert:

For compensation of the district attorneys of the United States, $20,100.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 2632, to insert:

For compensation of the district marshals of the United States, $12,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In line 99 there is one amendment of the Committee on Appropriations which was reserved.

Mr. HARRISON. In line 99 I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out the word "six," before "hundred," and inserting "eight;" so as to read, "$1,800." The committee proposed to increase the compensation to one clerk to the superintendent of the Senate document-room from $1,440 to $1,600. I propose to make it $1,800.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Iowa that the amendment agreed to on the motion of the Senator from Indiana would increase the total sum required for compensations of officers and employés of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir; by adding $200 in line 16. There was another change of $192. The total amount to be added on line 16 would be $392. I move to strike out $66,884.60 and insert $67,276.60.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this amendment? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Yesterday I offered an amendment in line 400 to strike out "one" and insert "two," but the Secretary and also the Reporter, as I note by the RECORD, took my amendment to apply to line 404. I wish to have that correction made by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the amendment adopted in line 404 be reconsidered and disagreed to and withdrawn, so that line 404 will stand as reported. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to. The Senator from Iowa also moves to amend line 400 by striking out the word "one" after "governments" and inserting "two;" so as to read:

For expenses of exchanging public documents for the publications of foreign governments, $2,000.

Is there objection to this amendment? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. After line 403 I move to insert, at the request of the Committee on the Library, as understood by the Committee on Appropriations, the following:

To enable the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress to purchase works of art, $12,000.

To enable the Secretary of State to contract for and purchase of Mr. B. F. Stevens 200 copies of each volume of the compilation to be prepared by him of certain documents relating to the peace of 1782 and 1783, 100 copies for the use of the Department of State and 100 copies for the use of the Library of Congress, the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this amendment? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the footing in line 402 after the change made in line 400.

Mr. ALLISON. It should be $13,500.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this amendment? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 166, after the word "installments," I move to insert:

And hereafter no speech or portion of a speech or remarks shall be printed in the RECORD that shall not have been delivered on the floor of the Senate or House of Representatives in open session.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I wish to say a word upon that amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. A point of order lies against it.

Mr. VEST. Very well.

Mr. MORGAN. I make the point of order on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. I raise the question that the amendment is new legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order. Has the Committee on Appropriations concluded its amendments?

Mr. ALLISON. Was there a point of order made upon the last amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] made the point of order that it is new legislation. The Chair thinks it is, in the form in which it is put.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Joint Committee on the Library to move to insert, after line 403, to follow the amendment adopted on the motion of the Senator from Iowa, the following:

To enable the Joint Committee on the Library to purchase the painting of the Electoral Commission of 1877, by Mrs. C. Adele Fassett, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the same committee to offer one other amendment, which completes the amendments of the Committee on the Library. After line 412, I move to add:

For concrete walks in Botanic Garden, and sundry necessary improvements to building, as per estimates of Edward Clark, Architect of the United States Capitol, $4,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. At the request of Senators I withdraw the point of order I made upon the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. I regret that I cut the Senator from Missouri off from making his observations.

Mr. ALLISON. I am much obliged to the Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "installments," in line 166, it is proposed to add:

And hereafter no speech or portion of a speech or remarks shall be printed in the RECORD that shall not have been delivered upon the floor of the Senate or House of Representatives in open session.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the exact meaning of that understood. I am in favor of the principle of the amendment; but would it prevent the ordinary revision of speeches, the correction of grammar, sometimes a transposition of words, and whatever little things of that sort may be necessary?

Mr. HALE and others. Oh, no.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is done every day.

Mr. ALLISON. It is not so intended.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish it distinctly understood; because, although I very seldom revise what little I say here, still when I do I find sometimes mistakes that I should like to correct. I have no objection to the amendment with the understanding that it is not to prevent us from doing what is usually done, transposing, &c., without inserting new matter.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think such an understanding as the Senator from Ohio suggests, if the language of the amendment becomes a law, will avail him. In my opinion, if the amendment is agreed to, neither the Senator from Ohio nor any other Senator could so revise his remarks as to insert a single word that he had not uttered on the floor. He might perhaps strike out, but I doubt whether he could insert. I do not think he could.

Mr. VEST. I offered the amendment substantially as the chairman of the committee has proposed it, and I have some doubt myself as to what would be the construction. I shall offer a substitute for it, which I think will meet the views of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. ALLISON. I will withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa is withdrawn. Does the Senator from Missouri offer an amendment to the bill?

Mr. VEST. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 166, after the word "installments," it is proposed to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the report in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shall be an accurate transcript of the proceedings and the debates of the two Houses of Congress, and that no speech shall be published therein which was not spoken in the Senate or in the House of Representatives, and such speeches shall be printed as they were actually delivered, except verbal corrections made by the author of the speech and by no other person; and that when speeches are reserved by their author for correction they shall be returned to the Reporter of the House in which they were delivered within one week, and if not so returned they shall then be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from the original notes of the Reporter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 100, among the Senate provisions, I move to strike out "seven hundred and twenty" and insert "nine hundred;" so as to read:

One page in the document-room, $900.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. The footing will then be changed again, adding $180 in line 17.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves to correct the total in line 17 by adding thereto the increase made necessary by the last amendment. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CALL. In line 113, I move to strike out "two hundred" and insert "four hundred and forty;" so as to read:

Conductor of elevator, $1,440.

I offer this amendment after conference with members of the Committee on Appropriations. The conductor of the elevator of the Senate was formerly paid $1,440. He has no assistant, and that is the sum which is paid in the other House. He has been classed with the messengers heretofore.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAPHAM. In line 2132, in the appropriations for the Patent Office, I am directed by the Committee on Patents to move to strike out "three" and insert "four" before the word "thousand," so as to read:

For assistant commissioner, $4,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I make the point of order on that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has the amendment been referred to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. LAPHAM. It has not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Chair is obliged to sustain the point of order.

Mr. PLATT. I desire to appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to withdraw the point of order. I know that this matter is not debatable. I am sure that this officer ought to receive at least $3,600; I think he ought to receive $4,000, but I shall be content to make it $3,600, so that he may be placed on an equality with the deputy commissioners of pension, two of whom receive $3,600.

Mr. INGALLS. What officer is it?

Mr. PLATT. The assistant commissioner of patents. He is a specialist; he is a gentleman who has large ability, and I think is fully entitled to $4,000. I wish the Senator would withdraw his point of order and consent that the salary be made $3,600.

Mr. LAPHAM. I have here a letter from the Commissioner of Patents, who says that the salary of the assistant commissioner is inadequate and that it ought to be increased to $4,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no doubt there is a great deal of feeling on the subject in the Patent Office, and I regret exceedingly to make the point of order, but the Committee on Appropriations have had numerous applications from almost every bureau and every Department of the Government to increase the compensation of officers. The committee yielded in one or two instances to what seemed pressing cases, and of course this among others was regarded by the committee. But we saw that if we went into it there would be no end of the business. I therefore shall be compelled to insist upon the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is obliged to sustain the point of order. The Chair will call the attention of the chairman of the committee to a correction necessary, in line 17, in the aggregate appropriation for compensation of Senate officers and employés. Since the amendment adopted on the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], the aggregate should now be $67,696.60. Is there objection to having it so corrected? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BECK. After the word "dollars," in line 960, I move to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That all distilled spirits entered for withdrawal for export may be set apart and remain, for a period not exceeding six months, in the warehouse of the distillery in which they were stored when so entered, subject to such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Mr. INGALLS. I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. BECK. I was about to say that I am afraid after consultation with a number of gentlemen, that the point of order will lie against this amendment. I have a statement from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which is perhaps too long to read, in regard to this matter, in which he says that he can now, by a good deal of circumlocution, give the length of time here proposed under the authority which is now confided to him, but he would rather have the direct authority of Congress to allow it to be done than to have to do it by any sort of indirection. That is the substance of his statement.

Under the law as it now stands the spirits can remain in warehouse a month or six weeks and then be sent to any port of export and remain there two or three months longer.

This is the condition: There are $29,000,000 of taxes to be paid before the 1st day of July and it is impossible for the holders of the spirits to pay them. They have been exporting all they could. They sent 57,780 barrels to different points, of which 25,000 barrels were sent to Bermuda, 3,000 to Hamburg, 26,000 to Bremen, 2,000 to England. The warehouses at Bermuda were absolutely full. They are building new houses for themselves at Hamburg and elsewhere, and they can not get the spirits exported because there are no conveniences for them. The banks of the country are carrying all they possibly can. These holders are driven to the point of bankruptcy; many of them have lately been compelled to make assignments. A little relief of this sort will perhaps enable them to pull through until the market shall improve.

I laid the matter before the Committee on Finance, and I was instructed by them, I believe unanimously, to present this as an amendment to the present bill, subject, however, to the point of order I admit. The Committee on Appropriations also looked at it carefully, after consulting with the Commissioner, and believing that it would be to the interest of the Government and its revenues, and in the interest of the business of the country at a time like this when it is quite important that the failures and embarrassments should not bring any further disasters, if they can be avoided, it was thought this relief might be given.

I do not think there is any dissent either in the Committee on Finance or the Committee on Appropriations as to the merits of the measure, but I know it was the general opinion that if the point of order was made I could not have the provision inserted here.

I believe I have stated the case now as it exists. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will correct me if I have not done so. That is all there is of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the Senator from Kansas, and thinks the amendment is not in order.

Mr. MITCHELL. In the appropriations for the Pension Office, in line 2075, I move to insert:

For chief of special examiners, $3,000.

Mr. ALLISON. Is that the only amendment the Senator will propose?

Mr. MITCHELL. There is another amendment that I think ought to be agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall yield to that amendment, but to no other. I think the chief of the division of special agents ought to have more compensation than he is receiving, and the committee so thought, and authorized me to make an exception in his case, but I forgot it.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Commissioner of Pensions, in his last annual report, says:

Mr. McCalmont, formerly the chief of this division, under whose supervision it was organized and developed, resigned on July 1, 1883, as chief, by reason of the failure of his health, and was assigned a supervising district, and I have secured the services of Mr. E. G. Rathbone, late of the Treasury Department, a man adapted in every respect to the development of this branch of our service, to take his place. He has thrown himself into the work with energy, and is giving personal supervision to the division of the country into districts and assignment of examiners and supervisors thereto, and already the influence of this work is being felt in accelerated results. It is believed that the net savings to be effected by this division in the coming year will be sufficient to defray the entire cost of this bureau to the Government for salaries, rents, and all expenses. I shall be disappointed if it does not, inasmuch as the work of the past year has more than one-half accomplished this result.

From the report of the special examination division of that bureau it appears that there were examined by these special examiners during the last year seven hundred and forty-one cases, and the saving resulting from their investigations are stated as follows:

Amount due and unpaid 158 pensioners whose names were dropped after investigation	$27,169 91
Accrued pension in 1,085 claims rejected after the investigation	1,372,715 11

This gentleman served many years as secret agent of the Treasury Department, and was selected specially on account of his large experience in that business.

Mr. ALLISON. My attention being called to it, in line 2075, after the word "each," I move to insert:

For chief of division of special agents, $2,500.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania withdraw his amendment?

Mr. MITCHELL. I withdraw my amendment, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 2075, I move to strike out "twelve" and insert "eleven;" so as to read:

Eleven chiefs of division at $2,000 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 2093, $500 must be added to the total footing for the Pension Office. I move to strike out "nine hundred and fifty-five thousand six" and insert "nine hundred and fifty-six thousand one hundred and fifty;" so as to read:

In all, $1,956,150.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the chairman of the committee to page 11 of the bill in the appropriations for the House of Representatives, where a clerk to the Committee on Naval Affairs has been added to the annual clerks, in connection with the question whether the total of the appropriations for the House officers and employés should not be changed.

Mr. ALLISON. It is the difference between $6 a day for four months and $2,000 a year. I ought to apologize to the Senate with reference to the footings. I usually have the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations here when these bills are considered, who makes the footings as we go along, but he is otherwise engaged this afternoon, and I have neglected the footings. The footings can all be corrected by the Secretary, by unanimous consent, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The item for clerk to Committee on Naval Affairs was inserted in line 240. The total appropriation for House officers and employés appears to be in lines 189 and 190.

Mr. ALLISON. The footing there has already been changed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But this amendment has been made since that change, the Chair understands.

Mr. ALLISON. Three hundred and thirty-eight thousand one hundred and fifty-five dollars and ten cents will cover the difference, as I foot it. It is now $337,955.10.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves to amend, in line 189 and 190, so as to make the total $338,155.10. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. GROOME. I should like to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to lines 2425 to 2432. I see that the chief of the division of dead-letters receives $2,250, and the chief of the division of postage-stamps receives a like amount, while the chief of finance division receives but $2,000. I am informed that the duties of the latter officer are as laborious and are more responsible than those of the other two chiefs; that under his supervision all the money to the mail contractors, aggregating twenty-odd million dollars a year, is disbursed. It seems to me that his salary ought to be equal to that of the other two officials, especially as he is a bonded officer. I ask the chairman of the committee if there is any serious objection to amending in line 2432 so that the chief of the finance division shall receive $2,250 a year? Such an increase was recommended a year ago.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know that there is any sort of objection to it except that this officer seems to be pretty vigorous on that question. We raised his salary last year from $1,800 to $2,000, and we hoped to have a rest for one year. I think the Senator had better not press the amendment.

Mr. GROOME. I do not see anything in the Book of Estimates on the subject. I do not propose to press it.

Mr. ALLISON, This officer received $1,800 up to last year.

Mr. BECK. I now propose the amendment that I had read some time ago, the consideration of which was postponed. After the word "dollars," in line 960, I move to add:

No part of the money hereby appropriated shall be expended for the maintenance of any grain distillery that has not a mashing capacity of ten bushels a day.

I desire a vote upon that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GROOME. I announce again that I am paired on all questions with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER].

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Bayard,	Coke,	Maxey,	Vance,
Beck,	Garland,	Morgan,	Vest,
Brown,	George,	Pendleton,	Williams.
Butler,	Hampton,	Pugh,
Call,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Cockrell,	Lamar,	Slater,

NAYS—27.

Allison,	Hale,	McMillan,	Platt,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Plumb,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Miller of Cal.,	Riddleberger,
Conger,	Hill,	Mitchell,	Sawyer,
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Morrill,	Sewell,
Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Palmer,	Sherman.
Frye,	Lapham,	Pike,

ABSENT—28.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Hoar,	Miller of N. Y.,
Anthony,	Fair,	Jackson,	Sabin,
Blair,	Farley,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,
Bowen,	Gibson,	Kenna,	Van Wyck,
Camden,	Gorman,	Logan,	Voorhees,
Colquitt,	Groome,	McPherson,	Walker,
Cullom,	Harris,	Manderson,	Wilson.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the question will be taken on the amendments in gross.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to reserve an amendment on page 4.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama reserves an amendment on page 4.

Mr. MORGAN. In line 81.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are several amendments on page 4.

Mr. MORGAN. In lines 81 and 82.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that amendment will be reserved and the question will be taken on all the other amendments together.

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reserved amendment will now be read.

The SECRETARY. In line 81, after the words "dollars," the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, struck out "acting assistant doorkeeper," and inserted "assistant sergeant-at-arms;" so as to read:

Assistant sergeant-at-arms, $2,592.

Mr. MORGAN. I merely desired to understand why we call upon Congress to prescribe officers for the Senate. Heretofore we have done this by resolution of the Senate entirely. I believe all of our Senate officers are chosen by order of the Senate, either by resolution or by election, and it seems to me that this is putting ourselves in the power of the other House unnecessarily.

Mr. ALLISON. I would say to the Senator from Alabama that it was represented to us by several gentlemen who had served on committees, that it was necessary to have an assistant sergeant-at-arms in order to have an officer to serve process. As it is now, there is no officer, as I understand, authorized to serve process, except the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. INGALLS. We could authorize any officer to serve a process, by resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. At any time.

Mr. INGALLS. That explanation seems to me unsatisfactory.

Mr. ALLISON. It is a matter I have no interest in whatever and no care about; but the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] and one or two other Senators who have been on investigating committees, made this suggestion to the Committee on Appropriations. If any Senator thinks it is an unwise thing to do, I shall not press it.

Mr. MORGAN. I merely wanted to know why it was that we were consulting both Houses in fixing the officers of the Senate.

I concur with the Senator from Kansas that there is no satisfactory explanation for this departure from custom. I do not care to have an officer put in over the Senate that we can not hereafter remove or change without the consent of the House. I do not think it good policy. I am willing to vote for a resolution appointing an assistant sergeant-at-arms.

Mr. INGALLS. This does not create the office of assistant sergeant-at-arms, as I understand it. It merely makes provision by appropriation for this year for an officer unknown to the law, unrecognized by our rules. I think the Senator from Alabama is clearly right in the suggestion he makes.

Mr. ALLISON. That is just where the Senator is mistaken. The Committee on Rules reported this special officer. When we came to look into it we found the Committee on Rules had changed the office, and if the Senator will look to the report of the Committee on Rules he will find that they have provided there for an assistant sergeant-at-arms.

Mr. INGALLS. It must be under some different name than this.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator has a copy of the rules I will show him where it is.

Mr. FRYE. In the House of Representatives there is a Sergeant-at-Arms and a Doorkeeper, two distinct officers. In the Senate of the United States there is a Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper under one name. By the resolution of the Senate an assistant doorkeeper was created. The assistant doorkeeper, Mr. Bassett, has been provided for as assistant doorkeeper, not assistant sergeant-at-arms and assistant doorkeeper, but assistant doorkeeper. By a resolution of the Senate a number of years ago an officer was created to act practically as assistant sergeant-at-arms, Mr. Christie, and he was named at the time, as I find in the debate before me. Mr. Conkling named Mr. Christie as the gentleman for whom at that special time the office was created. He is not assistant doorkeeper, because Mr. Bassett is assistant doorkeeper, and Mr. Bassett, the assistant doorkeeper, is elected by the Senate. The gentleman at yonder time, who has practically charge of the Senate Chamber, is appointed by the Sergeant-at-Arms and is really what in the House would be an assistant sergeant-at-arms.

When the Sergeant-at-Arms is absent he has no deputy mentioned in law anywhere, appropriation bill, or anything of that kind. There is no one authorized to sign the pay-rolls or do anything of that kind. And yet as a matter of fact the gentleman in charge of that door is deputy sergeant-at-arms, acts as such in every single thing except that when the Sergeant-at-Arms happens to be absent he has not the legal power.

I undertook in the Committee on Rules to have the office of Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper divided, as they were in the House, but there were objections made to that. I can not, however, for the life of me, see the slightest objection to calling this officer "assistant sergeant-at-arms" or "deputy sergeant-at-arms." He is in fact deputy sergeant-at-arms, and does all the duties of assistant sergeant-at-arms when the Sergeant-at-Arms is here. It does not interfere with the assistant doorkeeper in any possible way, because he is elected by the Senate and he is named assistant doorkeeper, and not assistant sergeant-at-arms. He is assistant doorkeeper, not deputy sergeant-at-arms and doorkeeper.

Mr. MORGAN. That is a very good explanation of it; but the Senate ought to do it; there is no reason why we should ask the House of Representatives to do this for us. It ought to be done by a resolution of the Senate, and not by a law of the land to be signed by the President. That is my objection to it.

Mr. FRYE. My judgment is that the officer will not be provided for anywhere except in the appropriation bills. The debate to which I have referred occurred on an appropriation bill. He has been named each year in the appropriation bill. All that I desired, so far as I was concerned, was that a proper name should be given him instead of the name which he received there.

Mr. MORGAN. Will there be any confusion between the functions of Mr. Bassett and Mr. Christie after this is passed?

Mr. FRYE. If he is called deputy sergeant-at-arms, of course not, because Mr. Bassett is assistant doorkeeper.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Christie is a much younger man than Mr. Bassett, and I do not desire to put him in any superiority over Mr. Bassett.

Mr. FRYE. The Committee on Rules determined without any hesitation that nothing should be done of any kind which would interfere at all with the dignity of the office occuped by Mr. Bassett, and he is left just as the Senate has created and elected him, assistant doorkeeper.

Mr. MORGAN. With that understanding I shall not press my objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made, as in Committee of the Whole, by striking out, in line 81, "acting assistant doorkeeper" and inserting "assistant sergeant-at-arms."

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Iowa informed me, with considerable spirit, I thought for him, that the Committee on Rules had provided for the appointment of an assistant sergeant-at-arms. I find by looking at Rule I that the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, who is also the Doorkeeper, has certain duties imposed upon him. The second rule is:

That the assistant doorkeeper and acting assistant doorkeeper shall be assigned during the day session of the Senate to duty upon the Senate floor.

There is no assistant sergeant-at-arms under our rules. This is the creation of an officer of the Senate by an act of Congress, and I object to any interposition on the part of the House of Representatives or the President of the United States, in declaring who the officers of this body shall be. It is one of the functions that belong to the Senate to say what their officers shall be, and what their executive corps shall consist of, and I reiterate the statement that there is no assistant sergeant-at-arms recognized by our rules. If the Senate desire to accede to the idea that the Congress of the United States shall prescribe who the officers of this body shall be, well and good; but I submit that it is an innovation which is very undesirable.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kansas if the President of the United States and the House do not participate in making all these offices just as much as the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir; because the other officers are recognized by the Senate and created by the Senate and that is merely a definition or description. But here is an officer not recognized by the rules, not created by action of the Senate, and for the first time appearing in an appropriation bill, and therefore it is created by an act of Congress.

Mr. DAWES. They are no less created by an act of Congress when they are found in an act of Congress because they were also in the rule. If the act of Congress creates the one, it creates the others that are mentioned in the same section and in the same operative words. An act of Congress makes each one of these just as much as it makes that one.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me this is a matter purely for the Senate to regulate by its own rule. If there is any feeling created by this—and I can conceive that there might be between old officers of the Senate—the best way is to let it go to the Committee on Rules, and, if it is deemed advisable to introduce a new officer called assistant sergeant-at-arms, we can do it by rule or resolution. This does not change the salary. I think therefore it had better be left to stand under the old rule.

The trouble is that hitherto the Doorkeeper of the Senate has always been considered the second ranking officer here, and I think there ought to be nothing to disturb that position. We ought not to change the relative rank of these officers or their standing and position until the Senate considers the subject more fully. I hope, therefore, that without further discussion and without any contest this matter will be allowed to stand, because all these officers are respected by Senators. I think it would be better to leave it stand under the old rule until the Committee on Rules consider it and act upon it and report what they think would be proper for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. I do not think any Senator desires to make the assistant doorkeeper anything but the second officer of the Senate. There is no question about that. Every Senator desires to have him remain the second officer of the Senate. After providing for the second officer of the Senate, calling the next officer assistant sergeant-at-arms does not give him rank before an officer who was created before him.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I did not desire to speak with any excitement upon this question, and if I did I wish to beg pardon of my friend who sits next me [Mr. INGALLS], because it is a matter that I would not get excited over, even for him. [Laughter.]

When this matter first came up in the Committee on Appropriations it was pretty generally believed that we having appropriated for a long time for an acting assistant doorkeeper should continue to do so; but after considerable conversation with the Sergeant-at-Arms we yielded to it. He explained to us the difficulties he had in the way of always being required to deputize some one to serve process, and that many times the Sergeant-at-Arms would like to be absent, and when absent if there was an assistant sergeant-at-arms he would be clothed with the authority of the Sergeant-at-Arms and could serve process.

Mr. INGALLS. Allow me one moment, right there.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to ask the Senator how, without the action of the Senate, the description of this officer as assistant sergeant-at-arms would authorize him to serve process?

Mr. ALLISON. That I will answer in a moment. We examined the situation, and we found that the rules provide for a Sergeant-at-Arms and a Doorkeeper.

Mr. INGALLS. No; that is the same officer. The Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper is one officer.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly. That is just what I say. The rules provide for the appointment of a Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, one person. We found that there was an assistant doorkeeper and no assistant sergeant-at-arms, and we found that this new Committee on Rules, which regulated everything for us so wisely and so well, changed entirely the rule upon this subject by declaring that the acting assistant doorkeeper should be assistant sergeant-at-arms. The Sergeant-at-Arms and Senators came to us, who seemed to understand this question; I confess I do not. Therefore the committee simply changed the phraseology. Of course we knew that we could not change this officer until the Senate agreed to it.

I have no wish about this matter for myself. If it in the slightest degree interferes with what now exists as the proper prerogative and priority in the Senate with reference to position and rank, I should be the last person to even suggest it. One of the first questions that I asked was whether it would place the present occupant of the position of acting assistant doorkeeper above or beyond the position held by another officer of this body, whom we all respect as we do. That question was thoroughly considered in the committee.

I have no wish about this. If it is not a wise thing to do, vote down the amendment. I care nothing about it and the committee cares nothing about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was not concurred in; there being on a division—ayes 19, noes 24.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report back with amendments the bill (H. R. 7012) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes. I move that the bill be printed, and that it be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. PLATT, Mr. PENDLETON, and Mr. SLATER submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MAHONE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. MILLER, of California, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. LAPHAM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 6087) authorizing the payment by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to Charles H. Getman, the firm of E. W. Rathbun & Co., the firm of Kinyon, Wright & Co., the firm of Bond & Jenkins, and the firm of Page, Fairchild & Co., certain duties paid by them on imported lumber accidentally burned while in custody of officers of customs and before the same had entered into consumption, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. 2722) for the relief of Martha Turner was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. 2344) for the relief of Melissa G. Polar was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7162) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

THE SIGNAL SERVICE.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to offer a resolution and have it considered now. As it only asks a report from the Secretary of War at the next session of Congress, I think there will be no objection to its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is directed to collate the various laws under which the Signal Service is organized, and to report a codification thereof with such amendments as he may suggest at the commencement of the next session of Congress. That he also report the status in the Army of the chief officer of the Signal Service Bureau, and the propriety of keeping the said bureau under the general supervision of the War Department.

Mr. HARRISON. Let that resolution lie over until we can see it in print.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over and be printed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. MAHONE introduced a bill (S. 2346) regulating the appointment of assistant naval constructors; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

THE TRADE-DOLLAR.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Finance Committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4976) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar.

Mr. HARRIS. Let that lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over and will be printed.

CHARGE OF DESERTION.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire with the leave of the Senator from Kansas to submit a report. The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 4383) to relieve certain soldiers of the charge of desertion, have instructed me to report the same back to the Senate with sundry amendments accompanied by a written report, and as amended recommend the passage of the bill. I ask that the report be printed and I give notice that at an early day I shall call up the bill for action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received if there be no objection.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 81) for the relief of Benjamin F. Pope;

A bill (S. 472) for the relief of George P. Webster;

A bill (S. 675) to extend the benefits of section 4 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1866," approved March 3, 1865;

A bill (S. 1721) for a bridge across the Misouri River at White Cloud, in Doniphan County, Kansas;

A bill (S. 1861) for the relief of the Atlantic Alcohol Company, of Atlantic, State of Iowa; and

A bill (H. R. 6215) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880.

TRANSPORTATION OF DUTIABLE GOODS.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the bill (S. 1925) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," now on the Calendar, be postponed indefinitely, the House bill on that subject having passed the Senate to-day.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PLUMB. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Will it be necessary to lay the Atlantic and Pacific forfeiture bill before the Senate as unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is before the Senate now, and awaits its reading.

Mr. PLUMB. Will it come up as the unfinished business to-morrow at 1 o'clock?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be the unfinished business for to-morrow if the Senate now proceeds to the consideration of executive business and then adjourn without taking up other business. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eleven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 51 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 26, 1884.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

BENJAMIN F. POPE.

Mr. DIBRELL. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. 81) for the relief of Benjamin F. Pope.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Benjamin F. Pope to be an assistant surgeon in the Army of the United States, as of the 14th day of May, 1867, and he shall take rank and position on the list of assistant surgeons as of the date aforesaid; and the said Benjamin F. Pope is hereby authorized to retain all pay and allowances actually received since the date of his original commission, and to receive all other pay and allowances due since that date: Provided, That he shall receive no pay or allowances for the time between February 13, 1871, and June 17, 1871, during which he was actually out of the service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to know whether this bill has been examined by any committee.

Mr. DIBRELL. It is a Senate bill, and has received the unanimous approval of the Committee on Military Affairs. This officer was mustered out by mistake under the act of July 15, 1870. The President revoked the order mustering him out and assigned him to duty. He is now in charge of the hospital records in the Pension Department, and has been for several years. But the Treasury officials have raised a question as to the authority of the President to revoke the order mustering him out. This bill simply settles that difficulty. It does not take one dollar out of the Treasury.

There being no objection, the bill was taken up, read three times, and passed.

Mr. DIBRELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHARLES H. GETMAN AND OTHERS.

Mr. NUTTING. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill which I send to the desk, and that the House now proceed to its consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6087) authorizing the payment by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to Charles H. Getman, the firm of E. W. Rathbun & Co., the firm of Kinyon, Wright & Co., the firm of Bond & Jenkins, and the firm of Page, Fairchild & Co. certain duties paid by them on imported lumber accidentally burned while in custody of officers of customs, and before the same had entered into consumption.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to refund to Charles H. Getman a sum not exceeding $4,196.17; to the firm of E. W. Rathbun & Co., a sum not exceeding $3,936.65; to the firm of Kinyon, Wright & Co., a sum not exceeding $2,129.23; to the firm of Bond & Jenkins, a sum not exceeding $1,604.38, and to the firm of Page, Fairchild & Co., a sum not exceeding $671.28; said sums being the amount of duties supposed to be paid by said parties, respectively, to the collector of the port of Oswego, N. Y., on lumber imported from Canada and destroyed by accidental fire at said port while in the custody of officers of the customs, and before the same had entered into consumption: Provided, however, That nothing shall be paid to either of said parties until he shall present proper vouchers to the accounting officers of the Treasury Department showing the amount paid by him for duties as aforesaid, and also showing the amount of imported lumber actually destroyed by said fire in each case on which the said duties were paid.

Mr. WELLER. I desire that the gentleman from New York [Mr. NUTTING] shall explain something about this bill. I want to know whether there was any insurance upon this lumber in favor of these parties at the time it was burned.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman from New York will make a brief statement, subject to the right to object.

Mr. NUTTING. Mr. Speaker, in 1881, I think, at the city of Oswego, N. Y., about three million dollars' worth of lumber was burned in one night by one fire. The lumber to which this bill refers was on the Government dock at the time of the fire. The duty had been paid upon it on the afternoon preceding the fire; and there was no insurance upon it, as I understand it. The lumber had been insured as it came across on the vessel, from Canada I suppose; but the insurance ceased when the lumber was placed on the dock, as I understand. This bill proposes to repay the duties upon the lumber destroyed at that time, those duties having been paid on the afternoon preceding the fire, and there having been no insurance whatever upon the lumber at that time, as I understand it.

Mr. WELLER. I understand from the gentleman that this lumber was not at the time of the fire in possession of the parties who are now seeking this redress, but was in the custody of the custom-house officers.

Mr. NUTTING. The lumber was in the custody of the Government. It was being counted and adjusted so as to get at the amount. The circumstances are clearly explained in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, which is printed in the report.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NUTTING moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MONUMENT TO MARY, MOTHER OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. GARRISON. I again ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 5410 and that the bill be now taken up and passed. The objection made to this bill a few days ago has been withdrawn.

The bill as amended by the Committee on the Library was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5410) for the completion of the monument to Mary, the mother of Washington, at Fredericksburg, Va.

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used in the completion of the unfinished monument to Mary, the mother of Washington, at Fredericksburg, Va., and for grading and inclosing with stone curbing and iron fencing a space of thirty-four feet square around the base thereof, substantially in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Committee on the Washington National Monument in their report to the House of Representatives of June 1, 1874; which sum shall be expended under the direction of the President of the United States or such officer as he may designate: Provided, That the money hereby appropriated shall be drawn, from time to time, only as may be required during the progress of the work, and upon the requisition of the President: And provided further, That no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be so expended until the lot of land at Fredericksburg, Va., on which said monument is situated (being thirty-four feet square) shall be conveyed, with all the right, title, and interest therein of the owner thereof, to the United States, and the deed duly recorded.

SEC. 2. That this act shall be in force from its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. WELLER. I am opposed to using any money for the building of any monument until the pensions of soldiers are paid when they are due. I object to this bill.

MARTHA TURNER.

Mr. HOUK. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2722) for the relief of Martha Turner, and that the bill be now taken up for passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Martha Turner, widow and beneficiary of John Turner, late of Union County, in the State of Tennessee, the sum of $2,000, in full payment for the services of the said decedent in piloting and conducting recruits from the confederate to the Union lines during the late war.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOUK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ATLANTIC ALCOHOL COMPANY, IOWA.

Mr. PUSEY. I ask by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 1861) for the relief of the Atlantic Alcohol Company, of Atlantic, State of Iowa.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the Atlantic Alcohol Company, of Atlantic, State of Iowa, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,734.20, in full for internal-revenue tax collected from them on certain distilled spirits on or about the 25th day of June, 1883, said spirits having been destroyed by fire on the 4th day of July, 1883, and before the proper stamps had been affixed: Provided, That the stamps issued to be used on the alcohol destroyed shall be first returned to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for cancellation.

Mr. PUSEY. I now ask that the Clerk read the certificate of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, June 24, 1884.

I certify that on July 18, 1883, tax-paid spirit stamps of the face value of $2,734.20 were received at this office, having been forwarded by the Atlantic Alcohol Company, of Atlantic, Iowa, for redemption; and that the said stamps are still in possession of this office unredeemed.

WALTER EVANS,
Commissioner of Internal Revenue.
A. H. H.

Mr. CABELL. I object.

Subsequently Mr. CABELL withdrew his objection; and there being no further objection the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PUSEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE OVER MISSOURI RIVER AT WHITE CLOUD, KANS.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 1721) for a bridge across the Missouri River at White Cloud, in Doniphan County, Kansas.

The bill was read, as follows:

An act (S. 1721) for a bridge across the Missouri River at White Cloud, in Doniphan County, Kansas.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Chicago and Central Kansas Railroad Company, an incorporation organized under the laws of the State of Kansas, is hereby authorized to construct and maintain a bridge across the Missouri River, at such point as may be hereafter selected by said corporation, within one mile of the town of White Cloud, in the county of Doniphan and State of Kansas, as shall best promote the public convenience and welfare and the necessities of business and commerce, and also to construct accessory works to secure the best practicable channel-way for navigation and confine the flow of the water to a permanent channel at such point, and also to lay on and over said bridge a railway track for the use of any railroads that are or shall be constructed to said river at or opposite said point; and said corporation may construct and maintain ways for wagons, carriages, and for foot-passengers, charging and receiving reasonable toll therefor as may be approved from time to time by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. That said bridge shall be constructed and built without interference with the security and convenience of navigation of said river beyond what is necessary to carry into effect the rights and privileges hereby granted; and in order to secure that object the said company or corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawings of the bridge, and a map of the location, giving, for the space of one mile above and one mile below the proposed location, the topography of the banks of the river, the shore-lines at high and low water, the direction and strength of the currents at all stages, and the soundings, accurately showing the bed of the stream, the location of any other bridge or bridges, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject; and until the said plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War the bridge shall not be built: Provided, That if the said bridge shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans, it shall have three or more channel-spans, and shall not be of less elevation in any case than fifty feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the lowest point of the superstructure of the bridge, nor shall the spans of said bridge be less than three hundred feet in length, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of said river, and the main span shall be over the main channel of the river, and not less than three hundred feet in length: And provided also, That if any bridge built under this act shall be constructed as a draw-bridge, the same shall be constructed as a pivot draw bridge, with a draw over the main channel of the river at an accessible and navigable point, and with spans of not less than one hundred and sixty feet in length in the clear on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw, and the next adjoining span or spans to the draw shall not be less than three hundred feet, and the head-room under such span shall not be less than ten feet above local high-water mark: Provided also, That said draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passing of boats; and said company or corporation shall maintain, at its own expense, from sunset till sunrise, such lights or other signals on said bridge as the Light-House Board shall prescribe: Provided also, That all railway companies desiring to use said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges in the passage of the same, and in the use of the machinery and fixtures thereof and of all the approaches thereto, under and upon such terms and conditions as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War, upon hearing the allegations and proofs of the parties, in case they shall not agree.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed, upon receiving such plan and map and other information, and upon being satisfied that a bridge built on such plan and with such accessory works and at such locality will conform to the prescribed conditions of this act, to notify the company that he approves the same; and upon receiving such notification the said company may proceed to an erection of said bridge, conforming strictly to the approved plan and location; and should any change be made in the plan of the bridge or said accessory works during the progress of the work thereon, such change shall be subject likewise to the approval of the Secretary of War; and in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river, caused or alleged to be caused by said bridge, the case may be brought in the circuit court of the United States of the State of Kansas or State of Missouri in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge may be located.

SEC. 4. That the said bridge and accessory works, when built and constructed under this act and according to the terms and limitations thereof, shall be lawful structures; and said bridge shall be recognized and known as a post-route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States than the rate per mile paid for the transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to said bridge; and said bridge shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-routes in the United States; and Congress reserves the right at any time to regulate by appropriate legislation the charges for freight and passengers over said bridge.

SEC. 5. That the United States shall have the right of way for such postal telegraph lines across said bridge as the Government may construct or control.

SEC. 6. That Congress shall have the power at any time to alter, amend, or repeal this act so as to prevent or remove all material and substantial obstructions to the navigation of said river by the construction of said bridge and its accessory works; and the expense of altering said bridge or removing such obstructions shall be at the expense of the owners of or persons controlling such bridge.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman from Iowa who heretofore objected to this bill has some amendments to offer.

Mr. WELLER. The gentleman having in charge this bill has consented that the following amendments shall be considered at the present time. They are satisfactory, as I understand, to him.

Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania. Of course the bill is still open to objection after the amendments have been read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa who has heretofore objected to this bill has withdrawn his objection.

Mr. WELLER. I have withdrawn my objection and have moved the amendments which I now ask the Clerk to read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the amendments will be read and will be acted on in gross.

There was no objection, and the amendments were read, as follows:

Amend section 2 by adding after the first word, "and," in the thirtieth line, the following words: "the best."

Further amend said section by adding after the word "prescribe," in the forty-first line, the following words:

"Provided, however, That said corporation or company shall build or cause to be built, at the time of the erection of said bridge, proper sheer-booms or other proper protections to safely guide vessels, boats, rafts, and other water crafts through any span of said bridge; and plans therefor shall be approved by the Secretary of War before said bridge is built: And further provided, In case of failure to so build such sheer-booms and other proper protections to navigation, the same shall be done by order of the Secretary of War at the proper costs, charges, and damages of, and to be paid by, said company or corporation."

Amend section 5 by adding after the word "telegraph," in the second line of said section, the words "and telephone;" also in line 3, same section, after the word "control," add the words "without damages or charges therefor;" so that said section, being so amended, will read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That the United States shall have the right of way for such postal telegraph and telephone lines across said bridge as the Government may construct or control, without damages or charges therefor."

Amend second 6 by striking out of line 2 the words "so as," and insert in their stead the word "also." Further amend section 6 by striking out in line 3 thereof the words "and substantial." Further amend section 6 by adding after the word "removing," in the fifth line, the words "said bridge, accessory works, or;" so that said section will read, being so amended, as follows:

"SEC. 6. That Congress shall have the power at any time to alter, amend, or repeal this act, also to prevent or remove all material obstructions to the navigation of said river by the construction of said bridge and its accessory works; and the expense of altering said bridge or removing said bridge, accessory works, or such obstructions shall be at the expense of the owners of or persons controlling such bridge."

The question recurred on the adoption of the amendments of Mr. WELLER.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 35.

Mr. WELLER. No quorum has voted. I would like, Mr. Speaker, if permitted, to make a suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The vote is being taken, and the point of no quorum having been made, the Chair will appoint Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. WELLER tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 36, noes 131.

So the amendments were rejected.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LEWIS. I now demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state there are several gentlemen on the floor who have matters merely for reference to committees. If there be no objection, those gentlemen will be recognized at this time.

Mr. LEWIS. I will yield for that purpose.

CONSOLIDATED INDEX.

Mr. SHELLEY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Clerk be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ a clerk during the recess for the purpose of preparing a consolidated index of the 22,298 claims reported to Congress by the commissioner of claims, under the act of March 3, 1871, and subsequent acts; also for the purpose of recording the cases referred to the Court of Claims under the Bowman act; said clerk to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the same compensation paid committee clerks.

MRS. SOPHIA HELRIGEL.

Mr. JORDAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7430) for the relief of Mrs. Sophia Helrigel; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 3961) to grant to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

Also, that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 6215) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880.

Also, that the Senate had passed a resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested, to print 11,000 extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries for 1884.

The message further announced that the Senate non-concurred in the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 838) to consolidate the Bureau of Military Justice and the corps of judge-advocates of the Army, and for other purposes, and asked a conference of the two Houses thereon; and further, that the Senate had appointed Messrs. LOGAN, SEWELL, and MAXEY as managers at said conference on the part of the Senate.

GENERAL LEWIS J. BLAIR.

Mr. LOWRY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7432) granting a pension to Lewis J. Blair, late colonel Eighty-eighth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and brevet brigadier-general; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM EAST.

Mr. CLAY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7433) for the relief of William East; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SYLVESTER GREENOUGH.

Mr. COOK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7434) granting a pension to Sylvester Greenough; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

L. A. DAVIS.

Mr. PERKINS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7435) granting a pension to L. A. Davis; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ELECTRIC PAGE-CALLS.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, by unanimons consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Rules:

Resolved, That the Western Electric Company, of Chicago, be permitted to attach to not less than five or not more than fifteen desks of members in the Hall of the House of Representatives electric page-calls on the system in use in the State-house at Des Moines, Iowa; and also in the capitol building at Lansing, Mich.: Provided, That said work shall be done at the expense of said company, and under the direction and supervision of the Committee on Rules, and shall not interfere with or injure the carpets or desks of members, and shall be removed by said company at its own expense upon the order of the House or of the Committee on Rules.

HUGH LYONS.

Mr. LORE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7436) for the relief of Hugh Lyons; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIM OF M'MANUS VS. MEXICO.

Mr. BELMONT, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 277) authorizing the Secretary of State to deliver to parties in interest, or their duly authorized representatives, custom-house certificates and other vouchers filed in support of the claim of McManus vs. Mexico; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN W. SANDERS.

Mr. NEECE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7437) for the relief of John W. Saunders; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MELISSA G. POLAR.

Mr. SPRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote whereby House bill No. 2344, for the relief of Melissa G. Polar, was ordered to be read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state for the information of the House that there was an error in the engrossment of this bill by which the word "of" was substituted for the word "to," and in order to correct that error it would be necessary to vacate the vote on the passage of the bill, and also the vote ordering it to be engrossed and read the third time.

If there be no objection these votes will be reconsidered and vacated.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. SPRIGGS. I now ask unanimous consent that the word "of," in line 2 of section 3, be stricken out and the word "to" be substituted; so that it will read:

That upon the presentation of said duplicate certificate to the Secretary, &c.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPRIGGS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF PENSION LAWS.

Mr. BRUMM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7438) to amend the pension laws; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LEWIS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Waldran; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

E. P. THOMPSON.

Mr. DOWD, from the Committee on Claims, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 410) for the relief of E. P. Thompson; which was referred to the Commmittee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MARY A. LEWIS.

Mr. ELLWOOD, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 690) for the relief of Mary A. Lewis, widow of Joseph N. Lewis; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

FRANCIS I. WHEELER.

Mr. ELLWOOD, from the Committee on Claims, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 5945) for the relief of Francis I. Wheeler; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

FRANK GALT.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Accounts, reported adversely the joint resolution (H. Res. 155) for the relief of Frank Galt, a notary public of the District of Columbia; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The list of committees was concluded.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Chair will recognize gentlemen to submit reports who were not in their seats when their committees were called.

There was no objection.

EMPLOYÉS OF GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Labor, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 7091) granting leave of absence to the employés of the Government Printing Office and pay when actually sick; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FORFEITURE OF ALABAMA LAND GRANT.

Mr. OATES, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported adversely the bill (H. R. 179) to declare forfeited certain lands granted to the State of Alabama to aid in the construction of railroads, &c., and to enforce the same by judicial proceedings; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

R. D. HAY.

Mr. BLACKBURN, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 2488) for the relief of R. D. Hay; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SUBMARINE CABLES.

Mr. VANCE, from the Committee on Patents, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 5326) to provide for the extension of letters patent for an improvement in insulating submarine cables; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MARY F. POTTS.

Mr. VANCE, from the Committee on Patents, also reported a bill (H. R. 7439) for the relief of Mary F. Potts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EMILY AGNEL.

On motion of Mr. LOVERING, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 765) for the relief of Emily Agnel; and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

FREDERICK A. REPLOGLE.

Mr. EVERHART, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back adversely the petition of Frederick A. Replogle, of Madison County, Tennessee; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

REPRINTING OF A REPORT.

On motion of Mr. HEWITT, of New York, by unanimous consent, the report accompanying the bill (H. R. 7366) giving effect to the convention with Mexico was ordered to be reprinted.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. KELLEY, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for the remainder of this session.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If the business of the morning hour is concluded, I move that the House proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. This is the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under the rules the motion indicated by the gentleman from Indiana can not be made until after the disposition of the unfinished business. The Chair will cause to be read the rule upon this subject.

The Clerk read as follows from Rule XXIV:

4. After the hour shall have been devoted to reports from committees, it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business in which the House may have been engaged at an adjournment, and at the same time each day thereafter, other than the first and third Mondays, until disposed of; and it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration of all other unfinished business whenever the class of business to which it belongs shall be in order.

5. Unfinished business having been disposed of, it shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House do now proceed to the business on the Speaker's table, which, the motion prevailing, the Speaker shall dispose of in the following order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana will see that his motion is in order only after the unfinished business has been disposed of.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I think the Chair is correct in his interpretation of the rule. But I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. May I not antagonize or raise the question of consideration as to the unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. And may I be permitted to say, Mr. Speaker, that my object in asking the House to go to business on the Speaker's table is that we may take up for consideration the amendments of the Senate to the Mexican war pension bill, which was passed in this House with so great unanimity a short time ago.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. It is a late hour for the gentleman from Indiana to become an advocate for pensioning soldiers of the Mexican war. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana raises the question of consideration respecting the unfinished business.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I wish to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. If the motion of the gentleman from Indiana should prevail and we should go to business on the Speaker's table, will it be for the consideration of the bill which he indicates or for all the business on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. It will be for the consideration of business on the Speaker's table in its regular order. But under the rules bills with Senate amendments have priority in the order in which they stand. The question is, Will the House proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business?

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 82, noes 60.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 135, nays 83, not voting 106; as follows:

So the House decided to consider the unfinished business.

The following were announced as paired on all questions until further notice:

Mr. COX, of North Carolina, with Mr. BAYNE.

Mr. BLACKBURN with Mr. RUSSELL.

Mr. MORRILL with Mr. GRAVES.

The following were announced as paired on all political questions until further notice:

Mr. HISCOCK with Mr. HERBERT.

Mr. TALBOTT with Mr. STEELE.

Mr. SNYDER with Mr. BARR.

Mr. HILL with Mr. HOLTON.

Mr. MORSE with Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois.

Mr. REAGAN with Mr. KELLEY.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina, with Mr. LACEY.

Mr. DAVIDSON with Mr. HAYNES.

Mr. BUCKNER with Mr. KELLOGG.

Mr. GREEN with Mr. THOMAS.

Mr. LE FEVRE with Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio.
Mr. ROGERS, of New York, with Mr. HOOPER.
Mr. PAIGE with Mr. BOUTELLE.
Mr. DUNCAN with Mr. SMITH.
Mr. DOCKERY with Mr. BREWER, of New Jersey.

Mr. CLARDY with Mr. JOHN S. WISE.
Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. CHACE.
Mr. MORGAN with Mr. CULLEN.
Mr. HUTCHINS with Mr. CALKINS.
The following were also announced as paired:
Mr. MULDROW with Mr. GOFF.
Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas, with Mr. BISBEE.
Mr. JONES, of Alabama, with Mr. BURLEIGH, until June 25.
Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, with Mr. KETCHAM, until June 30.
Mr. LAMB with Mr. LONG, until June 28.
Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, with Mr. PETTIBONE, until June 27.
Mr. SKINNER, of North Carolina, with Mr. PERKINS, until June 27.
Mr. WILKINS with Mr. KASSON, until June 27.
The following were announced as paired on this vote:
Mr. HAMMOND with Mr. JAMES.
Mr. BAGLEY with Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire.
Mr. SKINNER, of North Carolina, with Mr. ANDERSON.
Mr. CRISP with Mr. NELSON. Mr. CRISP would vote "ay," and Mr. NELSON "no."

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. I am paired with Mr. BURLEIGH on all questions except this land grant, and therefore I have voted.

On motion of Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

BACKBONE RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair). The House resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, the bill (H. R. 5682) to repeal section 22 of the act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, approved March 3, 1871, and to declare the forfeiture of the land grant therein made, and for other purposes.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the gentleman from California to submit a privileged report.

CHEROKEE RESERVATION, ARKANSAS.

Mr. HENLEY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 1781) to provide for the disposal of the Cherokee reservation in the State of Arkansas; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BACKBONE RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, the ground upon which the majority of the committee rely for the forfeiture of the land grant under consideration may be stated in the first place as a failure to construct the road on the line and to the point required by the granting act and the charter; secondly, as a failure to perfect the transfer of the grant by the grantee to the claimant company; and thirdly, that no road was constructed within the five years' limit expressed in the proviso to the grant.

At the conclusion of my remarks yesterday evening, when I gave way to a motion to adjourn, I stated that subsequently, December 11, 1872, in order to enable the Backbone company to avail itself of this grant, the Legislature of Louisiana amended the charter and authorized it to construct a road from Baton Rouge by the way of Alexandria to Shreveport; not to the eastern terminus of the Texas Pacific Railroad, but to Shreveport.

That proposition was questioned by the gentlemen from Louisiana [Mr. LEWIS]. I will read from page 1 of the majority report:

The State Legislature, act approved December 11, 1872, said:

> Full power and authority to commence the construction of their road in the city of New Orleans or Shreveport, or at any intermediate point on the line of their road, as may best suit the convenience of said company and facilitate the construction of a continuous line from the city of New Orleans to the city of Shreveport, or perfect railroad communication with the Texas Pacific Railroad or any other railroad in Northwestern Louisiana at or near the State line: Provided, however, That the said company shall construct the line of its road between the city of New Orleans and the city of Baton Rouge, on the east of the Mississippi River, to the corporate limits of the said city of Baton Rouge or adjacent thereto.

In all the legislation had by the State of Louisiana up to this point one of the objects was to have the road constructed upon the east side of the river. The grand object desired or sought, however, to be gathered from its legislation was the connection of New Orleans and the Lower Mississippi with the Texas Pacific railway system.

Let me remark, however, before leaving this point, that on the 2d of May, 1872, the Congress of the United States passed a supplemental act to the Texas Pacific grant, under the fifth section of which that company was required to construct its road or to control a road from Marshall, Tex., to Shreveport, La.; and in order to state the question here presented in a concise form I will read from the report of the Judiciary Committee, drawn by its chairman, always concise and to the point.

But before doing so let me say that the act of May 2, 1872, which in fact made Shreveport the eastern terminus, required it to allow connections to be made by any and all other railroad companies eastward. The Legislature of Louisiana at the following session, December 11, 1872, amended the charter of the Backbone company so as to give it the right of building its road to Shreveport, thereby recognizing Shreveport in this act of May 2 as in fact the eastern terminus of the Texas Pacific system, and not Marshall, as contended for by the majority of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman will pardon me, I understand him to be speaking of the legislative enactment of the State of Louisiana. Now, does the gentleman insist that the Legislature of that State could change the law of Congress with regard to fixing the terminus of this road which is subject to this grant? I want to understand the gentleman.

Mr. OATES. The gentleman will have an opportunity of replying to me, and if he will listen for the few moments that I have I will explain exactly what I mean.

Mr. LEWIS. Does not the very act you allude to make an express provision to that end?

Mr. OATES. As I have said, gentlemen will have the right to reply and can answer my points. But I will state to the gentleman that I am now speaking of the purposes of the Legislature in granting the charter, and that the Legislature recognized Shreveport as the eastern terminus of the Texas Pacific system.

Mr. COBB. But does the legislative enactment control the act of Congress?

Mr. LEWIS. Evidently the gentleman thinks so.

Mr. OATES. I must decline to be interrupted. Gentlemen, as I have said, will have ample time to reply.

Then February 13, 1873, the second and final map of location was filed and the withdrawal of the lands made. In June, 1875, the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company obtained its charter. February 19, 1876, but a few days before the expiration of the five years' limit in the proviso to the granting act, the Legislature of Louisiana amended the charter, and authorized the New Orleans Pacific company to build from New Orleans to Shreveport and Marshall or whatever point was necessary to form a connection with the Texas Pacific system. Thereby gentlemen will see the object of the Legislature of Louisiana was identical in this respect with the legislation of Congress in regard to the Backbone company. The object was to obtain a connection between the city of New Orleans and the lower Mississippi with the Texas Pacific railway system. This is not denied by the majority of the committee, who on page 3 of their report say:

> The line projected by this company corresponded with and ran in the same general direction as the route indicated by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railway Company, on file in the General Land Office, except that the route of the latter from New Orleans to Baton Rouge was on the east, while that of the former lay on the west, side of the Mississippi River.

But there was the difficulty again encountered; here was the grant to the Backbone company; the five years' limit had about expired. That company had done nothing except to file its map of location. It was not constructed; no part of the road had been built. It was by its inaction defeating and disappointing the object and purpose of the State of Louisiana and of the United States, for the desire of each, as expressed in their legislation, was to favor this important connection. Therefore, as the Backbone grant was in the way of the New Orleans Pacific and would not or could not proceed, on April 30, 1877, the Legislature of the State attempted to repeal the charter, and passed an act for that purpose; but still, owing to the nature and character of the grant and the unconstitutionality of the act, the New Orleans Pacific Company was not forwarded in its enterprise thereby.

In June following a case, perhaps an agreed case, which is characterized by the majority as a piece of judicial ledgerdemain, was presented in the United States circuit court at New Orleans and by that court decided that this repealing act was void.

This decision is characterized in the majority report as a piece of judicial ledgerdemain, but any gentleman it seems to me who will examine this legislation will see that the State of Louisiana and the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company were in accord; and that case was made for the purpose of determining the worth of the repealing act, if it had any. The judge properly decided that it was void. Although that decision, it is said, is not binding on the State of Louisiana because it was not a party to the suit, every lawyer knows or ought to know that the act was a nullity for the reason that in the charter it was stipulated that the said company—

> Shall possess and enjoy the rights and franchises granted to said company by the State of Louisana in this act and heretofore; and such grants and the engagements herein made and entered into on the part of the State of Louisiana shall be deemed to be, and shall be, binding contracts between the State of Louisiana and the said company, not to be impaired, disturbed, or modified by subsequent legislation, except with the consent and on the petition of said company.

Now, article 447 of the Code of Louisiana, in existence when this charter was granted, reads:

> A corporation legally established may be dissolved—
> First. By an act of the Legislature, if they deem it necessary or convenient to the public interest, provided that when the act of incorporation imports a contract, on the faith of which individuals have advanced money or engaged their property, it can not be repealed without providing for the reimbursement of the advances made or making full indemnity to such individuals.

Second. By the forfeiture of their charter, when the corporation abuses its privileges or refuses to accomplish the conditions on which such privileges were granted, in which case the corporation becomes extinct by the effect of the violation of the condition of the act of incorporation.

It is not claimed that on the second ground this corporation had forfeited its charter and had become extinct; but the repealing act is on the first ground. The Legislature passed a repealing act, when the record before the House abounds with evidence that this company had issued its bonds and sold them and had contracted debts and liabilities. Therefore it was not competent to repeal its charter without its consent, and this consent was not had; no petition was put in for this repealing act. Therefore it was not competent for the Legislature to repeal its charter without providing indemnity for its creditors, and the repealing act was a mere nullity.

What next? There was the grant still in the way. It is admitted, and therefore it is unnecessary to be argued, that the grant was of an estate upon condition subsequent. It is the undoubted law from Blackstone all the way through all the authorities to the present time that in this character of estate when the condition is not performed the estate does not become ipso facto void or revert. It is within the discretion of the grantor to permit the estate to continue vested or by a re-entry or acts equivalent thereto to terminate it. In the absence of such action on the part of the grantor, whether an individual or the Government or a corporation, the estate remains in the grantee. No one else can disturb it. The grant then stood thus in this case.

A sharp criticism is made in the report of the committee upon the conduct of the president of the New Orleans Pacific Company because he came before Congress after this act had been declared void and undertook to get this grant to the Backbone company declared forfeited and conferred upon his company. This action of his was in accord with the will of the State, because the State had done everything it could to get this Backbone company or its grant out of the way to permit the New Orleans Pacific Company to build the road and facilitate it in doing so. He came here and protracted his efforts. He urged that it was a defunct corporation—on the faith manifestly of this repealing act. But Congress declined to forfeit it. Bills were introduced. They were referred to committees. Strenuous efforts were made by Wheelock, the president of this company, to have this grant forfeited. It is cited as an evidence why it ought to be forfeited now because he said if this grant was out of the way his company was able and willing to construct the road without Government aid. But that is no ground for forfeiture. That is manifestly the result of his enthusiasm for a forfeiture in order to get the land grant out of the way or conferred upon his company—at least to get it removed.

When we look at the granting act we find that the purpose of the Government of the United States in making the grant was to have connection between the eastern terminus of the Texas Pacific system and New Orleans. That was the purpose of the Government, and the only requirements were that the road should be constructed to touch Baton Rouge and Alexandria and reach connection with the eastern terminus of the Texas Pacific and be completed within five years. The object of the State was the same, and the right of the company from Baton Rouge westward to Shreveport to build the road and the right of way were conferred by the Government of the United States in advance of any action by the Legislature of Louisiana.

The road has been constructed, and was completed in October, 1883, and is within the withdrawal limits of the grant. This is sufficient to entitle the company to the lands unless the failure to build the road within the five years will defeat their claim. (Van Wyck vs. Knevals, 106 United States Reports.)

After the failure upon the part of Colonel Wheelock, president of the company, to obtain a forfeiture of this grant, he then resorted to negotiation and purchase, and finally succeeded. There is in the report a criticism upon the mode of the purchase, and it is denied that any title passed by the purchase, on the ground that it was fraudulent and that there was no transfer made of this grant. It is admitted that it was transferable or assignable. That is not questioned. The record discloses that there was a meeting of the president and the directors, or a quorum of them, and they passed a resolution to make a transfer of the land grant of the Backbone company to the New Orleans Pacific. Subsequently the New Orleans Pacific Company accepted the transfer, the deed having been made by the authorities of the Backbone company on January 5, 1881. There was also a meeting of the stockholders of the Backbone company subsequently called for the purpose of ratification. They met and ratified the transfer.

Mr. LEWIS. State how they did it.

Mr. OATES. You state in your report that a majority of the stockholders were represented by Wheelock, the president of the New Orleans and Pacific Railroad Company, as their proxy.

Mr. LEWIS. I stated that he represented stockholders, not that he represented a majority of the stockholders.

Mr. OATES. It makes no difference in law whether this transfer was made for the purpose of defrauding or not; it is legal on its face. Although the consideration recited in the deed is but one dollar, that makes no difference. The New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company took the grant cum oncre, subject to forfeiture, subject to the claims of creditors. So far as the Government is concerned that transfer, whether it was made in good faith or with a fraudulent purpose, is res inter alios acta.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask a question?

Mr. OATES. No, sir; I have not time. If the transfer was made for a fraudulent purpose who had a right to complain? The creditors of the company, the stockholders of the company; no one else.

If this assignment was improperly made, made for a fraudulent purpose, the courts were open to the stockholders and to the creditors to interfere and interpose for the adjustment of their rights. It matters not to this Government whether this grant was thus transferred or not, the object, the grand purpose of the Government in making the grant has been completely effectuated; to wit, a road has been constructed touching all the points mentioned in the granting act. The road was thus constructed, completed, and trains running on it from New Orleans connecting with the Texas Pacific Railroad for something like a year and a half before the present bill was introduced to declare a forfeiture of the grant.

Mr. LEWIS. A bill was filed to forfeit this grant long before that, in 1878 or 1879.

Mr. OATES. Bills were introduced for a forfeiture prior to that time, it is true. Bills were introduced into the Forty-seventh Congress, mark you, before the completion of the road. What was the result? The bill or the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, which then had jurisdiction of the forfeiture of land grants. The House thereby had cognizance of the matter. After a full investigation, to the satisfaction of my learned friend from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], who was perfectly familiar with this whole subject, and who had, prior to that time, filed his objection in the General Land Office against the issuance of patents, that gentleman became satisfied that there was no just ground for forfeiture, and wrote a letter to the Secretary of the Interior so informing him.

Mr. LEWIS. Did he have any authority to withdraw the resolution?

Mr. OATES. He had to get permission of the committee to do it.

Mr. LEWIS. The resolution was offered in the House and referred to the committee.

Mr. OATES. A resolution in the same Congress was introduced in the Senate and referred to the proper committee of that body and by that committee considered and reported back, and its action declaring against this forfeiture was confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. LEWIS. My friend is mistaken.

Mr. OATES. No; I am not.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senate never took any action on that.

Mr. OATES. I will send it up to be read.

Mr. LEWIS. I know what the report is, but I do not think the Senate ever took any action upon it.

Mr. OATES. I will not have it read now, but will print it as a part of my remarks. The whole question is embodied in that report, which was concurred in by the Senate, and which is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 711, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

JUNE 7, 1882.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONAS, from the Committee on Railroads, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Railroads, to whom the subject was referred, submit the following report:

A petition has been referred to the Committee on Railroads of certain citizens of Louisiana, asking for the forfeiture of the land grant made to the New Orleans, Vicksburg, and Baton Rouge Railroad Company by the ninth section of the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, on the ground that the company to whom the grant was made has failed to build the road within the time prescribed by the act.

The grant was made to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge, and Vicksburg Railroad Company, its successors and assigns. That company was incorporated by an act of the Legislature of Louisiana, approved December 30, 1869. The object of Congress in making the grant was to aid in the construction of the proposed road, via Baton Rouge, Alexandria, and Shreveport, to connect with the eastern terminus of the Texas Pacific Railroad, and thus connect that road with the Mississippi River and the Gulf of Mexico.

The committee find that this connecting road, on almost the same line, and between the same points (if not built by the original grantees), has been built by the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, which was organized under a charter confirmed by an act of the legislature of Louisiana, approved February 19, 1876. This road is now completed and running between New Orleans and the eastern terminus of the Texas Pacific Railroad, at or near Marshall, Tex., its route being via Baton Rouge, Alexander, and Shreveport.

The New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company (which still has corporate existence), by deed dated the 5th day of January, 1881, granted and transferred to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company all its right, title, and interest in and to the lands granted to it by the before-mentioned act of Congress incorporating the Texas Pacific Railroad Company. This transfer was approved, ratified, and confirmed at a meeting of the stockholders of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company by a vote of two-thirds of its entire capital stock. The transfer was formally accepted by the board of directors of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company.

The deed of transfer, a certified copy of the resolution of the stockholders of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company ratifying the transfer, and a certified copy of the resolution of the board of directors of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company accepting the transfer, have been filed in the Department of the Interior.

A commissioner to inspect a portion of the railroad built by the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company was, upon the application of that company, appointed by the President of the United States, and the report of the said commissioner, approving the construction of the portion of the railroad inspected by him, was duly filed in the Department of the Interior.

Application is now made for the issuance of patents to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company for the lands granted by Congress to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, and by the last-named company assigned to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, as heretofore stated.

The grant was originally made to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, for the purposes above stated.

The road has been built by the assignee of the grantee, and the objects of the grant have been fully attained.

No forfeiture of the grant was made before the completion of the road on the grounds alleged, and we think it would be unjust and inequitable to make such forfeiture now when the work has been completed by the assignee company, which has built the road in good faith and in full expectation of receiving the benefit of the grant, which remained unforfeited and assignable in the control of their grantor.

Your committee think no consideration of public policy requires the forfeiture of the grant, and they recommend that the committee be discharged from further consideration of the memorial.

This brings me to the consideration of the third point. It is declared by the majority of the committee, and I may say, for the record discloses it, that the Committee on Public Lands are about as equally divided on this question as you can divide eleven men, six declaring for the forfeiture and five against—it is declared by the majority of the committee that this grant ought to be forfeited because no road was constructed within the five years' limit.

Now, I maintain that while it was within the power of the Government to declare a forfeiture at any time after the expiration of the five years, Congress having failed to do it until after the road was completed, that is a waiver of the right to declare a forfeiture, and it would be most inequitable for us to do so now. With reference to the transfer, let me remark, in passing, that recognition was had from the executive department, as summarized in that portion of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary to which I referred awhile ago and which I will now read:

The New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, after obtaining said deed from the Backbone company, applied to the General Land Office and Interior Department for information as to the recognition of the validity of the transfer of land to it on the part of the authorities of the United States. The events which led to this may be noted in order.

February 3, 1881.—Resolution of the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company authorizing its president to accept the grant. On the 17th of February a letter of Comissioner Williamson to Mr. Barnum, president of the Backbone company, which closes as follows (S. Ex. Doc. 31, pp. 23, 24):

"There can be no doubt that when the president of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company accepts said transfer, the company will be fully vested with all the right, title, and interest which the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company has in and to said grant."

On the 19th of February, 1881, the New Orleans Pacific Company accepted the grant, and on the 21st of February Commissioner Williamson wrote to Mr. Barnum, president of the Backbone company, in these words:

"The transfer by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company of all its right, title, and interests in and to said grant to the said New Orleans Pacific Railway Company is now complete." (S. Ex. Doc. 31, pp. 24, 25.)

These events in their order show that before its acceptance of the grant of lands the New Orleans Pacific Company was careful to be satisfied that their title would be effectual, and for the reason, which fully appears from the affidavits of G. M. Dodge and E. G. Wheelock, that they did not intend to undertake to build the road along the general line of the Backbone company without the Congressional land grant to that company as a basis of credit upon which to proceed securely.

Much contention seems to have arisen over this whole matter, as appears in Executive Document 31, which ended in the opinion of Attorney-General Brewster dated, June 13, 1882, upon the validity of the assignment. (See pp. 52-55.) That opinion held that the Congressional grant to the Backbone company was legally assigned to the New Orleans Pacific Company, and was a grant in præsenti.

I maintain that the building of the road by the New Orleans Pacific Company makes the question stand precisely in the attitude as though the road had been built by the original grantee, the Backbone company, with this exception: that after the transfer to the New Orleans Pacific Company they constructed the whole line of road in less than two years; there was no delay about it. The company was induced to build the road by the recognition of the officers of the Land Department, by assurances from the executive department of the Government that the transfer of the grant was complete, and by a letter from the delegation in Congress from Louisiana giving assurance that they would do all they could to secure the land grant to the New Orleans Pacific Company.

General Dodge swears that by reason of the land grant this company was induced to undertake the construction of this road; that without the land grant they would not have undertaken it, would not have expended the money necessary to have constructed it.

Now, touching the question of the right of forfeiture, it is a well-settled principle of law that any person interested in the estate may perform the condition, and the performance of the condition after the expiration of the time named dispenses with or discharges the condition if influenced or accepted by the grantor, or if with full knowledge he remains silent or forbearant and sees the condition performed without objection; in either event equity and good conscience alike declare that the right of forfeiture is thereby waived.

Now, in the limited time which I have, it is quite out of the question for me to read in extenso the authorities I have at hand upon this proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MORSE). The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] has expired.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask that the gentleman be allowed to proceed.

Mr. OATES. I desire but a few minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. OATES. There was full knowledge and recognition by the Government, because this question was brought to its attention in both branches of Congress, and was brought to the attention also of the Executive Departments; this, too, before the completion of the road, while the condition was in fact being performed, and yet Congress refused to forfeit this grant.

Mr. LEWIS. Refused?

Mr. OATES. It has not done so.

Mr. LEWIS. It has not had a chance to vote on the question; that is the reason.

Mr. OATES. Congress could have declared the forfeiture if it so desired. I wish to read from the head-notes in the case of Ludlow vs. The New York and Harlem River Railroad Company (12 Barbour's Reports, page 440):

The defendants obtained from the plaintiff a deed in fee of a strip of land, the fences, &c., and the deed was to cease and be void unless the railroad was completed through the premises granted on or before a certain day therein named. The road was not completed at the time specified, but the plaintiff made no effort to assert his right to the estate, or to do any act equivalent to an entry at the common law until two years after the forfeiture had occurred. During that time he saw the defendants making large expenditures over the premises in question; he gave them notice to make the fences, which they did accordingly about a year before the suit was commenced; he traveled over the road himself, &c.: Held, that no stronger evidence could be exhibited, short of the execution and delivery of a new deed, of a design to waive the forfeiture and confirm the grant than these facts, and that the plaintiff could not, therefore, recover the premises in an action of ejectment.

In 2 Paine's Reports, page 562, in the case of The People of Vermont vs. The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, the court said:

But without placing our opinion entirely upon this view of the case (although we think it would be difficult to surmount the objections already stated to the claim set up on the part of the State), the fact set up in the plea and admitted by the demurrer, that the condition has been performed, is an unanswerable objection to the claim of forfeiture.

It is a general rule that any one may perform a condition who has an interest in it or in the land whereto it is annexed; and if a time to perform be appointed, the purchaser may perform. This was the rule laid down in the case of Marks vs. Marks, and is recognized by the elementary writers; and when a condition is once performed it is thenceforth entirely gone, and the thing to which it was before annexed becomes absolute and wholly unconditional.

This was a legislative grant, and the condition was performed after the expiration of the time specified.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. OATES. Yes, sir.

Mr. LEWIS. Are not the cases which the gentleman has cited cases of private deeds? And does the gentleman contend that the principles applicable to covenants in private deeds apply to public grants?

Mr. OATES. They do, Mr. Speaker, with this exception: A public grant must be construed more strongly against the grantee than a private grant; in other words, in the case of a legislative grant the act must show that the right claimed is within the grant. Notwithstanding that rule, the common-law rule with reference to the performance of conditions in the case of estates upon condition is not changed at all, but is the same whether the grant be a public legislative one or a private one.

In the case of Marks vs. Marks (10 Modern) Lord Chancellor Parker, assisted by the master of the rolls, held that an estate in remainder, upon condition that the remainderman pay a certain sum of money within three months after the death of the first taker, that the condition was performed and the estate became absolute by a payment of the money after the three months had expired.

In Williard vs. Alcott (2 N. H.) a grantor of an estate to his son, on condition that the son should maintain the father in a certain manner during his life, which the son failed to do, it was held that the failure of the father, who resided on the premises, to notify the son that he re-entered and took advantage of the breach before suit brought, was a waiver of his right of forfeiture.

In Chalker vs. Chalker (1 Conn.) there was a breach of condition in non-payment of an annuity, and the grantor subsequently accepted the money. This was held to be a waiver of the condition subsequent attached to the grant, and that a forfeiture once waived can never afterward be claimed.

In Hume vs. Kent (1 Ball and B.) it was held that allowing a tenant to lay out money in repairs of the estate after a breach of condition was a waiver of the right to declare a forfeiture.

In Andrews vs. Senter (32 Maine) it was held that any acts by the grantor or vendor inconsistent with his claim of forfeiture are evidence of a waiver of that right.

I could enumerate many more authorities to the same effect. They run all through the books.

Now, there is this difference only between my friend from Illinois and myself in regard to this question: In the minority report it was claimed that the seventeenth section of the act had an effect upon this grant. I now admit, on further investigation, that it has not. Therefore the only difference between us is in the language employed, wherein he claims that the equities in this case are with the company, and that no forfeiture should be had—evidently meaning what I mean. The difference is in mere form of expression rather than in substance.

I believe that we agree that as between an individual and the New Orleans company the individual as grantor would on the facts have no standing in a court of justice to declare this grant forfeited.

I claim that the condition having been performed, the grantor, with full knowledge, having permitted the condition to be performed, although the time had elapsed, would as between individuals constitute an estoppel against declaring this forfeiture. We may speak of an equity in a legislative sense, meaning nothing more than a declaration of public policy. But when we speak of equities as known and ascertained by rules it is law, as well defined in its enlarged sense. Therefore in this case I maintain that both by law and equity, by the fixed rules which obtain in like cases between individuals, the Government has no right to declare this forfeiture. That this Government is strong enough to do whatsoever it pleases I will not question. But the doctrine that laches are not to be imputed to the Government, that the Government can do no wrong, is a doctrine which belongs only to governments which recognize the divine right of kings as the supreme law.
